5. The national Government can easily find a road that will reach resumption in a reasonably speedy time, if it shall firmly determine to do so.

6. While what is known as a favorable balance of trade would facilitate resumption, it is not indispensable.

7. It is our duty to proceed toward resumption without regard to what for the moment is the condition of the balance of trade.

8. Specie payment persistently maintained is a powerful means of securing a "favorable balance."

9. The home price of exportable products is fixed in the foreign markets that buy our surplus.

10. Irredeemable paper money (with the resulting inflation of prices) tends strongly to cause an unfavorable balance of trade, and almost inevitably causes the payment of that balance in the precious metals.

11. A large volume of irredeemable paper nullifies a tariff.

These propositions sufficiently explain my general creed on this subject. A single word further and I am done. By the original legal-tender act, which made legal-tenders convertible on presentation into gold bonds; by the second act, which provided for the same conversion into gold bonds; by your pledge made when you sanctioned Secretary McCulloch's policy; by your solemn act of legislation which General Grant signed as the first act of his administration; by every pledge you have made in your political conventions, especially including the last; by every message of the President you are honoring; by the doctrines of sound finance; by the entreaty of the best business men in the country, you are commanded and solemnly pledged, not to resume to-day or to-morrow or next year, but not to turn your backs upon resumption—only to set your faces thitherward and to do your utmost to bring this country up to the high level of commercial and political honor.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Before the gentleman sits down, let me ask him a question. I understood him to say there was no man so near or so dear to him, that, if he opposed him on this doctrine which he has been endeavoring to illustrate, he would support for office. I wish to ask the gentleman from Connecticut if he does not know, after the Supreme Court had decided against the validity of the legal-tender notes, that General Grant before his last election reconstructed that court? I ask him if, after all that which he pronounced against it, he did not support General Grant himself when he ran the last time for the Presidency?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I do not see any conundrum in that at all.

Mr. HEREFORD. And that, too, in order to give validity to greenbacks, which the gentleman from Connecticut has denounced as a thing to which he was opposed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not think the gentleman is so ready to repudiate his party, or any man who stands so near to him, because he differs from him in opinion on a subject of this sort.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. If the gentleman from Connecticut will allow me I will answer, and I will do it in one word.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let the gentleman from Connecticut answer. He has declared that, for himself, he would support no man who does not square with him on this question of finance, as he enunciated it to-day.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I do not know exactly what the gentleman is driving at, but he seems to charge me with inconsistency in supporting General Grant for the Presidency at the last election. General Grant has declared himself uniformly, from beginning to end, in favor of resumption of specie payment. I do not make the issue upon the constitutionality of greenbacks in time of war. I say there was great doubt, even under the war necessity, that we had a right to issue them, but I regard that question as settled. I regard the Supreme Court as having decided we had the right under the pressure of the great calamity of war to issue them. At all events the discretion rested with Congress, and Congress having exercised it, it remained only for the Supreme Court to say we had that power. I am not fighting on the constitutionality of the original issue.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let me ask the gentleman to answer my question. He has not yet come to the point. It is well known to the country that the Supreme Court, as organized before the appointment of the new judges, had come to the decision that "greenbacks" were unconstitutional as a legal tender. General Grant, for the purpose of reversing that decision, or having them declared valid, reorganized the Supreme Court, when a new decision was made. Yet the gentleman from Connecticut supported with all his power and influence General Grant for the Presidency after the occurrence of these events.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I could go on for some considerable time to explain that reorganization of the Supreme Court, but I do not know that I could commit the question to better hands than to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] to whom I yield the floor.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The fact is not as the gentleman from Wisconsin states it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have put the question to the gentleman from Connecticut, and I want him to answer.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. That slander has been repeated from the stump until it has once or twice been put squarely down. I published a letter, under my own hand, giving the dates, which contradict it perfectly, and the gentleman is utterly mistaken about it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not wish the gentleman from Connecticut to appear by counsel. [Laughter.] I wish him to answer it himself.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I am stating a fact. It is not a matter of ability, it is a matter of truth; and I say the gentlemen who were put upon the bench of the Supreme Court were nominated before the first legal-tender decision was given. Their nomination was sent in to the Senate on the morning of the very day on which that decision was given, and reached the Senate before the decision was given in the Supreme Court, and when it was reported in Washington that the decision of the court was going to be the other way. There was no more reason to believe those two gentlemen would give a different opinion on the legal-tender question from that which the court first gave than there was that Chief Justice Chase would give a different opinion—nor half so much at the time they were nominated.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman from Massachusetts knows and the country knows very well the decision would have been one way if there had not been added two other judges, and he knows very well the decision was finally a different way with these two other judges.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. But the gentleman said that these gentlemen were put there to reverse the decision.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I understood the gentleman to say so. He said General Grant reorganized the court "for that purpose."

Mr. ELDREDGE. I stated that it was very well known to the country that the decision was against the validity of the greenbacks as a legal tender, and that after that two judges were added to the bench, and then there was a different decision.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. They were not; and there is where I differ from the gentleman. I say that their nomination was sent in before that decision was given.

Mr. ELDREDGE. They took part in the decision, but if the decision had been given before it would have been different from what it was, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. They were appointed before the decision was made.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That makes no difference. That does not alter the case. The Supreme Court had considered the question, and two judges were added afterward, and a different conclusion was come to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. But they were appointed before.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not care when they were appointed. They did sit in the case, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. POLAND. I ask the House to take a recess until half-past seven o'clock; and I have the satisfaction to announce, on behalf of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, that we expect to close our labors this evening.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. BECK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be so amended that it shall not be in order for the Speaker of the House to entertain a motion to extend the time of a member for a longer time than one hour, and such extension shall not hereafter be granted by unanimous consent.

CURRENCY.

Mr. PARSONS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2785) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of the United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," passed June 30, 1864; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FIELD. I ask unanimous consent to present a memorial of the citizens and business men of Detroit, in favor of an increase of the currency, that it may be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I desire to state that the memorial represents, in my judgment, the sentiment of a large majority of the citizens of Detroit on the currency question.

There was no objection, and the memorial was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

The question being taken on Mr. POLAND'S motion for a recess, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening to resume the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States. It is entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873."

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to strike out sections 1365 and 1366, on page 303.

The sections were as follows:

SEC. 1365. The Admiral shall be selected from the next grade below.
SEC. 1366. The Vice-Admiral shall be selected from the list of rear-admirals.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The committee have agreed that these sections should be stricken out.

The motion to strike out the sections was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to add as a new section, to come in between sections 1460 and 1461, what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 1460 the following as an additional section:
There may be allowed upon the retired list of the Navy nine rear-admirals by promotion on that list: Provided, That this section shall not prevent the Secretary of the Navy from promoting to the grade of rear-admiral on the retired list, in addition to the number herein provided, those commodores who have commanded squadrons by order of the Secretary of the Navy or who have performed other highly meritorious service.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to add as a new section, immediately following the section which has just been adopted, what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Officers on the retired list of the Navy shall be entitled to promotion as their several rates upon the active list are promoted: Provided, That no promotion shall be made to the grade of rear-admiral upon the retired list while there shall be in that grade nine rear-admirals by promotion on that list, exclusive of those so promoted by reason of having commanded squadrons by order of the Secretary of the Navy or of having performed other highly meritorious service.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move now to insert as section 1804 and section 1806 the sections which I send to the Clerk's desk. I will state that these sections were in the original revision as prepared by Mr. Durant, but that they were stricken out in the House. They were stricken out because they were somewhat local in their character, and at the time they were stricken out it was supposed we would insert in the revision some chapters relative to the District of Columbia, and it was thought that this would more particularly belong to the chapter embracing the laws relating to the District of Columbia. These sections, however, refer to pipes, branches, &c., connected with the water-works, which extend outside the District of Columbia and into Virginia; and the offenses enumerated in this section would be punishable in the State of Virginia. It is thought better, all things considered, to restore these sections just as they were; that is to restore sections 1804 and 1806.

The Clerk read the sections, as follows:

SEC. 1804. Every person who maliciously breaks, injures, defaces, or destroys any main or pipe, bend, branch, valve, hydrant, service-pipe, or any other fixture used for the distribution of water throughout the streets and avenues, or for its introduction into the houses, tenements, or buildings of Washington and Georgetown, shall be punishable by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than two years.

SEC. 1806. Every person who maliciously commits any act by reason of which the supply of water, or any part thereof, to the cities of Washington and Georgetown, becomes impure, filthy, or unfit for use, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or imprisoned at hard labor in the District of Columbia not more than three years nor less than one year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I now move to strike out chapter 5, commencing on page 289 of Durant's revision, and to insert in lieu of it what I send to the Clerk's desk.

I will say a word in explanation of that amendment. At the time Mr. Durant was employed to prepare this revision he was instructed to prepare a chapter on military offenses, which was to include not only the existing laws upon the subject, but such other provisions as he might deem necessary to make a complete penal military code. He prepared that chapter, and in doing so he transferred from the original Articles of War a number of provisions in those articles and some provisions of other statutes, and he added in his chapter on penal military offenses many new provisions, entirely new legislation. It has been thought better by the committee to submit that chapter as a separate matter to the House, so that the revision of the laws shall contain nothing but the existing state of the law—the law as it existed on the 1st of December last. In order to carry out that idea we propose to strike out the fifth chapter of Durant's revision, which contains only a part of the Articles of War, and to insert in lieu of it the Articles of War complete, as they are in the substitute which I submit to the House.

I will say that this substitute is substantially that prepared by Judge James and reported by the commissioners in their revision of the statutes; but the Committee on Revision of the Laws have changed it somewhat, so as to make it conform to the law as it existed on the 1st of December.

Mr. POLAND. Allow me to say a word further about this new chapter. Mr. Durant was directed in the bill passed a year ago to prepare a chapter to define the punishment for military offenses. He selected out a considerable number of the Articles of War where no penalties were provided and affixed penalties to them, and inserted them in the new chapter he had prepared defining military offenses; and they were left out of the general revision of the Articles of War. This proposed change is merely to restore those Articles of War that Mr. Durant had taken out for the purpose of inserting them in his military bill; and as the committee determined that this revision should be wholly of the existing laws without change, we have restored the Articles of War that Mr. Durant had taken out for the purpose of forming a part of his military offenses bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. The first amendment I have to offer is to section 3556.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3556. The different mints and assay offices shall be known as—
First. The mint of the United States at Philadelphia.
Second. The mint of the United States at San Francisco.
Third. The mint of the United States at Carson, Fourth. The mint of the United States at Denver.
Fifth. The United States assay office at New York.
Sixth. The United States assay office at Boise City, Idaho.
Seventh. The United States assay office at Charlotte, North Carolina.

Mr. BARBER. I move to insert between lines 4 and 5 the words "the mint of the United States at New Orleans."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move now to insert between sections 3557 and 3558 the following as a new section:

SEC. —. The superintendents of the mints at Philadelphia, San Francisco, and New Orleans shall be, and perform the duties of, treasurers of said mints respectively.

The coinage act made the superintendents of these three mints treasurers of those mints. The reviser, Mr. Durant, had left that out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASON. The first amendment I have to offer is to section 4446. It will be remembered that the House amended that section by adding the following proviso:

Provided always, That if any officer entitled to a part or share of any such penalty or forfeiture shall be necessary as a witness on the trial for such penalty or forfeiture, such officer may be a witness upon the said trial; but in such case he shall not receive, or be entitled to, any part or share of the said penalty or forfeiture, and the part or share to which he would otherwise have been entitled shall accrue to the United States.

We wish to withdraw that proviso. On full consultation it is thought that the same language has been repealed by another act, the coinage act of 1799, and modern legislation has been entirely contrary to the provisions of that amendment. Taking it altogether we think that perhaps it is not the law as it stands, and for that reason we withdraw it.

The proviso was withdrawn.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move to insert on page 1012, to come in before section 4028, the chapter concerning the mails, the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. The following are established post-roads:

All waters of the United States, during the time the mails are carried thereon; all railroads or parts of railroads, which are now or hereafter may be in operation; all canals during the time mails are carried thereon; all plank-roads during the time mails are carried thereon; the road on which the mail is carried to supply any court-house which may be without a mail, and the road on which the mail is carried under contract made by the Postmaster-General for extending the line of posts to supply mails to post-offices; but are not established routes during the time such mail is carried thereon; all letter-carrier routes established in any city or town for the collection and delivery of mail-matter.

This was omitted at the time the revision was made, because it was expected to be put in in another connection and in a separate chapter. We now propose to prefix it to the ninth chapter, concerning the carrying of the mails.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 4654.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4654. No collector shall grant to any vessel except canal-boats employed in navigating the canals within the United States, whose enrollment or license for carrying on the coasting trade has expired, a new enrollment or license, unless the master of such vessel shall have first rendered a true account to the collector of the number of seamen and the time they have been employed on such vessel, during the continuance of the license which has so expired, and shall have paid to such collector forty cents per month for every such seaman who shall have been employed; which sum the master is hereby authorized to retain out of the wages of such seaman. Whenever the master of any registered, enrolled, or licensed vessel of the United States renders a false account of the number of seamen so employed, or of the length of time they have severally been employed, as is herein required, he shall be liable to a penalty of fifty dollars, which shall be applied to and shall make a part of the general fund created by this title; and all needful regulations for the mode of collecting the sums hereinbefore mentioned shall be prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, by such person as by him may be designated.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move to amend that section by striking out in line 16 the words "by this title," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "for the relief of sick and disabled seamen."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 4871.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4871. The several collectors of the customs shall respectively deposit, without abatement or reduction, the sums collected by them under the provisions of law imposing a tax upon seamen for hospital purposes, with the nearest depositary of public moneys, and shall make returns of the same, with proper vouchers, monthly, to the Secretary of the Treasury, upon forms to be furnished by him. All such moneys shall be placed to the credit of "the fund for the relief of sick and disabled seamen;" of which fund separate accounts shall be kept in the Treasury. Such fund is appropriated, and shall be employed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the care and relief of the sick and disabled seamen employed in registered, enrolled, and licensed vessels of the United States.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move to amend that section by adding at the end of line 9 the following words: "For the expenses of the marine-hospital service."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 4873.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4873. Sick foreign seamen may be admitted to the marine hospitals within the United States, if it can with convenience be done, on the application of the master of any foreign vessel to which any such seaman may belong. Each seaman so admitted shall be subject to a charge of seventy-five cents per day for each day he may remain in the hospital, which shall be paid by the master of such foreign vessel to the collector of the collection district in which such hospital is situated. And the collector shall not grant a clearance to any foreign vessel until the money so due from her master shall be paid. The director of each hospital is hereby directed, under penalty of fifty dollars, to make out the accounts against each foreign seaman that may be placed in the hospital under his direction, and tender the same to the collector.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move to amend that section by striking out the word "director" in line 10, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "officer in charge;" so that it will read:

The officer in chargs of each hospital is hereby directed, under penalty of fifty dollars, to make out the accounts against each foreign seaman, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I will now ask the Clerk to turn to page 1220, section 4795. It will be recollected that several sections were stricken out at that point, and others inserted in lieu thereof. The second of the sections proposed as a substitute by the committee read, "that if any person referred to in the preceding section has died in the service, or of injuries received, or of disease contracted," &c. The words "in the service," at the suggestion of some one, I do not now remember who, were erased, and it will be found so marked in the section as the Clerk has it. We have carefully examined that matter since, and find that, with reference to these naval pensions, accruing prior to 1861, those words are everywhere used. They are found in the act of June 30, 1834, and in the act of August 11, 1848, which acts contain the law concerning these naval pensions prior to 1861. The committee are, therefore, of the opinion that those words that were stricken out should be restored. I ask that that be done, that the words "in the service," which were erased, be restored.

It was so ordered.

Mr. MOORE. I have only a few amendments to offer, and shall occupy but a few minutes. One or two things escaped my attention in that portion of the work which I passed over on a former occasion, to which I now wish to call the attention of the House. The first of these is found in section 3654, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3654. The superintendent of the mint at Dalles City and Carson City, and the superintendent of the assay office at Boise City, shall be assistant treasurers of the United States, and shall respectively have the custody and care of all public moneys deposited within the mint and branches herein named, and shall perform all the duties required of them in reference to the receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of all such moneys, as provided by law.

Mr. MOORE. I move to amend that section by striking out in line 1 the words "Dalles City and;" so that it will read "the superintendent of the mint at Carson City," &c. I move also to strike out in line 5 the words "within the mint and branches herein named," and insert in lieu thereof the word "therein."

I offer these amendments to this section for the reason that the act establishing the mint at Dalles City seems to have been repealed by the act of February 12, 1873, commonly known as the "coinage act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman whether the grammatical construction of the section as it would read if amended as he proposes would not be that these officers should have the care of all public moneys deposited in the United States.

Mr. POLAND. It might be construed to apply to the mints.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair merely desired to call attention to that point.

Mr. POLAND. O, it is all right.

Mr. MOORE. As I was remarking, the act establishing the mint at Dalles City was repealed by the act of February 12, 1873, which specifies what shall be known as the mints of the United States, and it does not include that at Dalles City.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. I move to strike out section 3665, for the reason that that section seems to be superseded by the coinage act.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3665. The chief and other clerks in the treasury department of the Mint shall give such assistance in the assistant treasury of the United States at Philadelphia, in the receipt, custody, and disbursement of the public money, as may be required of them by the treasurer, with the same responsibility for the faithful performance of such duty as is imposed upon them by the laws in force for the government of the Mint, and of the officers and clerks thereof. The treasurer of the Mint, as assistant treasurer at Philadelphia, may designate, from among the clerks in his office, one to act as chief clerk to the assistant treasurer.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. The next amendment I have to offer is to section 3821.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3821. The Congressional Printer shall hold his office for the term of two years, commencing with the first day of each Congress; shall receive a salary at the rate of $4,000 a year, and shall give bond, for the faithful discharge of his duties, in the penal sum of $80,000, with two sureties to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MOORE. I move to amend that section by striking out the words "shall hold his office for the term of two years, commencing with the first day of each Congress."

The reason for this amendment is found in the fact that the act of February 22, 1867, creating the office of Congressional Printer, simply provides that that officer shall be chosen by the Senate, but it makes no provision whatever as to the length of time for which he shall serve. It is true the Superintendent of Public Printing, the officer who was superseded by the Congressional Printer, held his office for the term of two years. But, as already stated, the act creating the office of Congressional Printer makes no provision whatever as to any definite term. Accordingly the present incumbent of that position, as I understand, has held it ever since his first election by the Senate, shortly after the passage of the act, and I presume will continue to hold it until the Senate shall choose a successor.

Mr. LAWRENCE. He holds it at the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. POLAND. He is an officer of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. I move to strike out section 3879, on page 984.

The section was as follows.

SEC. 3879. The Congressional Printer shall not be allowed credit at the Treasury for payments on account of services rendered in the Government Printing Office at higher prices than those paid for similar services in the private printing and binding establishments in the city of Washington.

Mr. MOORE. That section is simply a proviso to section 3 of the joint resolution of June 23, 1860, in relation to public printing. I think it was clearly repealed by the act of July 20, 1868, which authorizes the Congressional Printer to secure employés at such rates as are for the interest of the Government and will be just to those employed; which provision I find embraced in section 3825 of this revision.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. These are all the amendments which are deemed to be necessary in that portion of the work which I have examined, and therefore I have nothing further to offer.

Mr. POLAND. I have an amendment to move to section 1813.

The section referred to was as follows;

SEC. 1813. The Secretary of the Interior shall pay to the District of Columbia the just proportion of the expense incurred in improving any avenue, street, or alley passing by or through any property of the United States, which such property bears to the whole cost thereof; and such proportion shall be ascertained in the same manner as such cost is apportioned among the individual proprietors of the property improved thereby; but such payments shall be made only upon vouchers approved by the engineer in charge of public buildings and grounds of the District, after full examination and measurement of said improvements and the approval of the prices claimed therefor; and the board of public works of said District are prohibited from incurring or contracting further liabilities on behalf of the United States in the improvement of streets, avenues, and reservations beyond the amount of appropriations previously made by Congress, and from entering into any contract touching such improvements on behalf of the United States except in pursuance of appropriations made by Congress.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out all of the first part of the section down to the words "the board of public works;" also to strike out the word "further," in the latter part of the section before the word "liabilities;" so that the section, as amended, will read as follows:

The board of public works of said District are prohibited from incurring or contracting liabilities on behalf of the United States in the improvement of streets, avenues, and reservations beyond the amount of appropriations previously made by Congress, and from entering into any contract touching such improvements on behalf of the United States except in pursuance of appropriations made by Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out sections 3154 and 3155, because they are both included in the next section.

The sections referred to were as follows:

SEC. 3154. If any person shall conceal or buy any merchandise, knowing it to be liable to seizure by this title, he shall forfeit and pay a sum double the value of the merchandise so concealed or purchased.

SEC. 3155. If any person shall receive, conceal, or buy any merchandise, knowing it to have been illegally imported into the United States, and liable to seizure by virtue of any act in relation to the revenue, such person shall forfeit and pay a sum double the amount or value of the merchandise so received, concealed, or purchased.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 3166.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 3166. Except into the districts hereinbefore described on the northern, northwestern, and western boundaries of the United States, adjoining to the Dominion of Canada, no merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture, subject to the payment of duties, shall be brought into the United States from any foreign port in any other manner than by sea, nor in any vessel of less than thirty tons burden, agreeably to the admeasurement directed for ascertaining the tonnage of vessels; or landed or unladen at any other port than is directed by this title, under the penalty of seizure and forfeiture of all such vessels, and of the merchandise imported therein, landed or unladen in any other manner.

Mr. POLAND. I move to insert after the words "Dominion of Canada" the words "or into the district adjacent to Mexico."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out section 2499 as amended on a former evening.

The section as amended was as follows:

SEC. 2499. The equipments, or any part thereof, including boats purchased for, or the expenses of repairs made in a foreign country upon, a vessel enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States to engage in the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, or a vessel intended to be employed in such trade, shall, on the first arrival of such vessel in any port of the United States, be liable to entry and the payment of an ad valorem duty of 50 per cent. on the cost thereof in such foreign country; and if the owner or owners or masters of such vessel shall willfully and knowingly neglect or fail to report, make entry, and pay duties as herein required, such vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be seized and forfeited. But the owner or master of a vessel enrolled and licensed or intended to be enrolled and licensed to engage in the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers, shall furnish good and sufficient evidence that such vessel, while in the regular course of her voyage, was compelled, by stress of weather or other casualty, to put into a foreign port and purchase equipments, or make repairs, to secure the safety of the vessel to enable her to reach her port of destination, then it shall be competent for the Secretary of the Treasury to remit or refund duties thereon, and such vessel shall not be liable to forfeiture. And no license, or enrollment and license, or renewal of either, shall hereafter be issued to any such vessel, until the collector to whom application is made for the same shall be satisfied, from the oath of the owner or master, that all such equipments and repairs, made within the year immediately preceding such application, have been duly accounted for under the provisions of this section, and the duties accruing thereon duly paid; and if such owner or master shall refuse to take such oath, or take it falsely, the vessel shall be seized and forfeited.

Mr. POLAND. That section, together with the amendment, is found in another place in this revision.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in the first part of section 2500.

That portion of the section was as follows:

SEC. 2500. There shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles mentioned in the following schedules, imported from foreign countries, the rates of duty which are by the schedules respectfully prescribed: Provided, That on the goods, wares, and merchandise in this section enumerated and provided for, imported from foreign countries, there shall be levied, collected, and paid only 90 per cent. of the several duties and rates of duty imposed by the said schedules upon said articles severally, that is to say.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is to strike out the word "following" before the word "schedules" where it first occurs, and to insert after that word "schedules" the words "contained in the next section;" so that it will read, "articles mentioned in the schedules contained in the next section," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in the paragraph of the same section relating to "wools, hair of the alpaca," &c.

The paragraph referred to was as follows:

On all wools, hair of the alpaca, goat, and other animals, and all manufactures wholly or in part of wool or hair of the alpaca and other like animals, except as hereinafter provided.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is to strike out the words "as hereinafter provided," at the end of the paragraph, and to insert "umbrellas, parasols, and sunshades covered with silk or alpaca." The words "as hereinafter provided" were used in the act, but as placed here they are perfectly meaningless. It becomes necessary to state what was "hereinafter provided" in that statute in order to make it intelligible.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in the paragraph of the same section, relative to paper.

The paragraph referred to was as follows:

On all paper, and manufactures of paper, excepting unsized printing-paper, books and other printed matter, not herein specifically provided for.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is to strike out the words "not herein specifically provided for," and to insert in lieu the words "and except sized or glued paper suitable only for printing-paper."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I also move to amend the same section by inserting before the words "Schedule A" the words "section 2501;" so that Schedule A will begin a new section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to the paragraph on page 608, relating to leather.

The paragraph referred to was as follows:

Leather, japanned, patent or enameled, and leather of all kinds not otherwise provided for, 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment is to insert after the word "leather" at the beginning of the paragraph the words "and skins;" also to strike out the words "and leather of all kinds not otherwise provided for;" so that it will read:

Leather and skins, japanned, patent or enameled, 35 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 2529, in the paragraph establishing collection districts in the State of Connecticut. I move to amend the line relating to Stonington so that it will read, "in the district of Stonington, a collector who shall reside at Stonington."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2709, relating to the compensation of surveyors of ports, by striking out the word "Stonington" in line 9 as printed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2673 by inserting "Minnesota" after the word "Idaho."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2651 by striking out the word "before" at the end of line 20, and inserting the word "elsewhere;" so that the phrase will read, "not elsewhere enumerated."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2652 by striking out after the words "naval officer" these words:

The latter paying one-third of the expense of the necessary stationery, and of the rent of an office to be provided by the collector, at the place assigned for his residence, and as conveniently as may be for the trade of the district; except the expense of fuel, office rent, and necessary stationery for the collectors of Salem and Beverly, Boston and Charlestown, New York, Philadelphia, Charleston, Baltimore, Norfolk and Portsmouth, which shall be paid, three-fourths by the collectors, and the other fourth by the respective naval officers in those districts.

So that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 2652. Where a naval officer is appointed to the same port, the fees allowed by the preceding section shall be equally divided between the collector and the naval officer, and all fees shall, at the option of the collector, be either received by him or by the naval officer, the party receiving to account monthly with the other for his share thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out section 2848, as follows:

SEC. 2848. When any merchandise is intended to be imported from any foreign country into the port of Columbus in Mississippi, such merchandise may, so long as Columbus is continued as a port of delivery, be entered at the port of Mobile and thereafter transported to Columbus, upon compliance with sections 2853 to 2859, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2820 by inserting after the word "vessels," in the first line, the words "engaged in the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 2820. Enrolled or licensed vessels engaged in the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, or northwestern frontiers of the United States, departing from or arriving at a port in one district to or from a port in another district, and also touching at intermediate foreign ports, shall not thereby become liable to the payment of entry and clearance fees or tonnage tax, as if from or to foreign ports; but such vessels shall, notwithstanding, be required to enter and clear.

This section as it stands seems to be a general provision, while in fact it should be limited.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2938 by adding thereto a proviso, so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 2938. All additions made to the entered value of merchandise for charges shall be regarded as part of the actual value of such merchandise, and if such addition shall exceed by 10 per cent. the value declared in the entry, in addition to the duties imposed by law, there shall be collected a duty of 20 per cent. on such value. But nothing contained in this and the preceding section shall apply to long combing or carpet wools costing twelve cents or less per pound, unless the charges so added shall carry the cost above twelve cents per pound, in which case one cent per pound duty shall be added: Provided, That this and the preceding section shall not be construed as impairing the provisions relating to duties on the several classes of imported wool contained in section —, under Schedule L.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out section 3891, which is a duplicate of section 208.

Section 3891 was as follows:

SEC. 3891. Whenever official notice is received at the Department of State that any amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States has been adopted according to the provisions of the Constitution, the Secretary of State shall forthwith cause the amendment to be published in the newspapers authorized to promulgate the laws, with his certificate, specifying the States by which the same may have been adopted, and that the same has become valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the Constitution of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 3795 by striking out at the end the following clause:

Every officer of the Government who knowingly violates the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined $2,000 and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years.

So that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3795. No contract shall be entered into for the erection, repair, or furnishing of any public building, or for any public improvement which shall bind the Government to pay a larger sum of money than the amount in the Treasury appropriated for the specific purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out section 5552, which is a duplicate of section 3232.

Section 5552 was as follows:

SEC. 5552. Every officer or agent, appointed or acting under the authority of any revenue law of the United States, who is guilty of any extortion or willful oppression under color of law, or who knowingly demands other or greater sums than authorized by law; or who receives any fee, compensation, or reward for the performance of any duty, except as by law prescribed; or who willfully neglects to perform any of the duties enjoined on him by law; or who conspires or colludes with any other person to defraud the United States; or who makes opportunity for any person to defraud the United States; or who does, or omits to do, any act with intent to enable any other person to defraud the United States; or who negligently or designedly permits any violation of the law by any other person; or who makes or signs any false entry in any book, or makes or signs any false certificate or return in any case where he is by law or regulation required to make any entry, certificate, or return; or who, having knowledge or information of the violation of any revenue law by any person, or of fraud committed by any person against the United States under any revenue law, fails to report, in writing, such knowledge or information to his next superior officer and to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; or who demands, or accepts, or attempts to collect, directly or indirectly, as payment, or gift, or otherwise, any sum of money, or other thing of value, for the compromise, adjustment, or settlement of any charge or complaint for any violation or alleged violation of law, except as expressly authorized by law so to do, shall be dismissed from office, and shall be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years. And one-half of the fine so imposed shall be for the use of the United States, and the other half for the use of the informer, who shall be ascertained by the judgment of the court; and the court shall also render judgment against such officer or agent for the amount of damages sustained in favor of the party injured, to be collected by execution.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 5391 by adding these words: "and every such person, being thereof convicted, shall suffer death;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 5391. Every person who knowingly aids, abets, causes, procures, commands, or counsels another to commit any murder, robbery, or other piracy upon the seas, is an accessory before the fact of such piracies; and every person, being thereof convicted, shall suffer death.

The amendment supplies a clerical omission, which will be found pointed out in the chapter of errata.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by adding a proviso to section 2771, so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 2771. The President may from time to time cause such of the revenue-cutters as have become unfit for further service to be sold; and the proceeds shall be paid into the Treasury: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may apply in the purchase or construction of revenue-cutters any unexpended balance of the proceeds of revenue-cutters sold by him under the authority of section 2 of the act of the 20th of April, 1866, chapter 63.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND moved also to amend by striking out section 3138, as follows:

SEC. 3138. It shall be lawful for any officer of the revenue to go on board of any vessel, whether she shall be within or without his district, and the same to inspect, search, and examine; and if it shall appear that any breach of the laws of the United States has been committed, whereby such vessel, or the merchandise on board, or any part thereof, is or are liable to forfeiture, to make seizure of the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND moved further to amend by striking out sections 3001 and 3002, as follows:

SEC. 3001. All brandy imported in casks of a capacity less than ninety gallons shall be deposited, at the expense and risk of the importer, in such public or other warehouses as shall be designated by the collector or surveyor for the port where the same shall be landed.

SEC. 3002. All kinds of imported wine may be put into the custom-house stores, under the bond of the importer or owner; no wines, however, shall be so deposited unless in the casks or bottles as imported.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND moved also to amend by striking out section 3013, as follows:

SEC. 3013. Nothing herein contained shall be understood to prohibit the sale of such quantities of merchandise so stored as may be necessary to discharge the duties thereon, at the time or times when such duties shall become due and payable.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out at the end of section 3015 these words: "nothing herein contained is intended to modify the laws in relation to pickled fish or refined sugar;" so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 3015. No merchandise subject to duty shall be entered for drawback or exported for drawback after it is withdrawn from the custody of the officers of the customs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 2596, to strike out in line 9 of that section the words "and Duncan City a port of delivery."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out section 4279. That section, as we have already amended it, is a duplicate of section 2819.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4279. Vessels used exclusively as ferry-boats, carrying passengers, baggage, goods, wares, and merchandise, shall not be required to enter and clear, nor shall the masters or persons in charge of such vessels be required to present manifests, or to pay entrance or clearance fees or fees for receiving or certifying manifests.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out sections 4275 and 4276, which are both covered by section 4051.

The sections proposed to be struck out were as follows:

SEC. 4275. No vessel arriving at any port within the United States where a post-office is established, shall be permitted to report, make entry, or break bulk, until the master shall have delivered to the postmaster all letters directed to any person within the United States, or Territories thereof, which, under his care, or within his power, are brought in such vessel, except such as are directed to the owner or consignee of the vessel.

SEC. 4276. It shall be the duty of the collector or other officer of the port empowered to receive entries of vessels, to require from every master of such vessel an oath, purporting that he has delivered all such letters, except as above mentioned; and every commander or master of any such vessel who breaks bulk before he has complied with the requirements of this section shall be liable to a penalty of not exceeding $100.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move, on page 1141, to strike out section 4525.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That has already been done.

Mr. POLAND. I move on page 785, section 3185, in line 2, after the word "any" to insert "such;" so it will read, "on board any such vessel." As it stands here it would seem to be a general provision, while it refers to a particular class of vessels provided for in the preceding section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I now move an amendment which I am glad to propose as an additional title.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPEAL PROVISIONS.

SEC. —. The foregoing seventy-three titles embrace the statutes of the United States, general and permanent in their nature, in force on the 1st day of December, 1873, as revised and consolidated by commissioners appointed under an act of Congress, and the same shall be designated and cited as The Revised Statutes of the United States.

SEC. —. All acts of Congress passed prior to said 1st day of December, 1873, any portion of which is embraced in any section of said revision, are hereby repealed, and the section applicable thereto shall be in force in lieu thereof; all parts of such acts not contained in such revision having been repealed or superseded by subsequent acts, or not being general and permanent in their nature: Provided, That the incorporation into said revision of any general and permanent provision taken from an act making appropriations, or from an act containing other provisions of a private, local, or temporary character, shall not repeal or in any way affect any appropriation or any provision of a private, local, or temporary character contained in any of said acts, but the same shall remain in force; and all acts of Congress passed prior to said last-named day, no part of which are embraced in said revision, shall not be affected or changed by its enactment.

SEC. —. The repeal of the several acts embraced in said revision shall not affect any act done, or any right accruing or accrued, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any civil cause before the said repeal; but all rights and liabilities under said acts shall continue, and may be enforced in the same manner as if said repeal had not been made; nor shall said repeal in any manner affect the right to any office, or change the term or terms thereof.

SEC. —. All offenses committed and all penalties or forfeitures incurred under any statute embraced in said revision prior to said repeal may be prosecuted and punished in the same manner and with the same effect as if said repeal had not been made.

SEC. —. All acts of limitation, whether applicable to civil causes and proceedings or to the prosecution of offenses, or for the recovery of penalties or forfeitures, embraced in said revision and covered by said repeal, shall not be affected thereby, but all suits, proceedings, or prosecutions, whether civil or criminal, for causes arising or acts done or committed prior to said repeal, may be committed and prosecuted within the same time as if said repeal had not been made.

SEC. —. The arrangement and classification of the several sections of the revision have been made for the purpose of a more convenient and orderly arrangement of the same, and therefore no inference or presumption of a legislative construction is to be drawn by reason of the title under which any particular section is placed.

SEC. —. The enactment of the said revision is not to affect or repeal any act of Congress passed since the 1st day of December, 1873, and all acts passed since that date are to have full effect as if passed after the enactment of this revision, and so far as such acts vary from or conflict with any provision contained in said revision, they are to have effect as subsequent statutes, and as repealing any portion of the revision inconsistent therewith.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, we have offered these provisions so as to guard against every possible harm which can arise to anybody. It may be possible some provision of law has escaped everybody's search. The commissioners went over this work for three years, and Mr. Durant reviewed it all, and after the thorough search our committee have made into it, they do not believe any important provision of law has been omitted in this revision; but it is possible, with all our care something may have been omitted. We have, therefore, in drawing these provisions, provided no man's right shall be affected by this repeal in any manner or form, or any public right, so if it should turn out some provision of law has escaped our reading and been omitted in this revision, it will not affect any man's right, but will be only a loss of so much statute law. We think there is no danger in adopting these provisions, which have been most carefully and thoroughly considered.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I ask the gentleman from Vermont if he proposes now to adopt the bill finally.

Mr. POLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I would suggest that these sections should be printed. They are very important, and the members of the House should have the opportunity of examining them. I do not see why it would not be better to give us an opportunity to know what we are doing. What objection would there be to that?

Mr. POLAND. I would state that the only objection there is to it is that we have already taken a great deal of time. We had more faith in our own diligence than we had in that of the body of those who review our work. And although we have been as industrious we think as it is possible for men to be, and to be at the same time thorough in our work, we have already got somewhere near, as I hope, the end of this session. It will take a considerable time to prepare this bill to have it go to the Senate. And our work, as my friend will see, is not final. It has all to be reviewed by another body, and it is very important indeed that we should get it to them. And I would now like to ask my friend if we should have these sections printed how many members of this House does he think will ever read them?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I hope all the membrs of this House will do so.

Mr. POLAND. I would hope every member of the House would read this entire revision and give their attention to it; but I scarcely expect they will.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I know of one member who would wish to examine carefully these general sections.

Mr. POLAND. I cannot think that the time that would be wasted in getting this printed, now that we are very anxious to get the bill to the other House that they may go through with it at this session, would be at all compensated for by the attention which members would give to it.

The committee have drawn these sections with very great care. We have consulted a great number of statutes of different States, embracing provisions that they have made applicable to their revisions; and have gone something beyond all the provisions that we were able to find in any of the State statutes, for the purpose of observing the utmost care that there should not be any danger that any right could be injured that any man had; and I hope my friend will be satisfied that it will be safe for this House to adopt them without creating any further delay.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. There is not any gentleman in this House or in this Congress in whom I have more confidence than I have in the gentlemen who have done this work. But there are no men so intelligent, there are no men so talented, there are no men so able, but that other gentlemen might make suggestions that might be valuable. It does seem to me that in a matter so important as this there ought to be a vote of the House; it does seem to me that in a matter so important as the passage of a law of this kind there ought to be a vote of something like a quorum of the House.

Now, these general sections at the end of the revision are very important. I speak only for myself when I say that I should like to have the opportunity of examining them more at leisure than could be done by hearing them read at the desk. I think they ought to be printed. It would not delay the passage of the bill, and a vote could be taken in the House at any time. It would not cost more than one or two days' delay.

Mr. POLAND. It would delay us a week.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I would suggest to the gentleman that to meet his view we would have to see every individual member of the House and learn whether he had looked over these sections and was entirely satisfied. They have been the most anxious subject of consideration, perhaps, of anything that has been before the committee. They were prepared some weeks ago, and have been brought up for consideration again and again. Every sentence in them has been weighed carefully, and all the suggestions that have been made have been listened to with the sole purpose of making them as nearly perfect as possible. And they have been prepared, as the chairman of the committee has said, with the aid of the general sections of the revisions of a great number of the States of the Union which have revised their statutes, and have had this very same thing to guard against in their revision. We have gone over them sentence by sentence and made them as perfect as we can.

We see no good reason for delay, in order to bring this up at another time in the House, when we have no cause to doubt that it will be perfectly satisfactory to the House. If we had supposed that it was the desire of any gentleman to examine these sections, we would have been glad to have him do so, because we wanted all the assistance we could get. But the whole work is to go before the Senate, and if any gentleman finds anything that requires amendment, it will be perfectly easy for him to make a suggestion, and I am satisfied that the object of every member of the House and every member of the Senate is the same—and that is the object with which we started in the beginning of the session, to endeavor to reduce to this one volume what was the general public statute law of the United States on the first day of this session; and at the same time that nothing herein contained shall affect the right of any man, public or private; but that this shall stand as the law as it then was. And we have put into as clear language as the committee could frame the declaration of that purpose in these sections, having got a good deal of aid from the similar attempts of other legislative bodies.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Have these sections been printed?

Mr. POLAND. They have not.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I would not like to urge anything which the gentlemen who have charge of this work think would delay it materially. Still it is a matter of so great importance that I think there ought to be a vote of the House upon it. And I think these sections ought to be printed before final action by the House, but I do not desire to set up my judgment against that of the gentlemen who have the work in charge.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The House has been notified that this was the final evening, and that the work was to be completed to-night.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. We do not pass an ordinary bill, generally, without having it printed; we print everything, even ordinary pension bills; an amendment to an ordinary bill is printed.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. We have adopted all the amendments to this bill without having them printed, and at sessions where there was no larger attendance than there is now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not at this moment aware of any parliamentary method in which this revision can be brought up in the House. The House has, by unanimous consent, directed this business to be performed at these evening sessions, and the Chair knows of no method by which any portion of this bill, or any single amendment, can be brought before the House at a day session. Of course, any gentleman has a right to insist on a quorum being present before anything is done here, but the Chair does not know of any mode in which this bill can be brought into the House in the day-time, except by a report from the committee de novo and a new reading of the bill.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. In deference to the views of other gentlemen, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has given some reflection to the matter, but does not see any other mode. Of course after the passage of the bill any gentleman might move to reconsider; but the motion to reconsider would require, under the order the House has made, to be dealt with at an evening session. The only possible way of getting a vote on the bill in a full House would be for some gentleman to insist on the point that a quorum is not present, and in that case there would have to be a call of the House, and members would have to be brought in here in the evening.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I withdraw my suggestion.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I now move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at nine o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

The motion was agreed to.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is a very important question. The bill passed this body without any discussion, and I think it should not now be referred to a committee of conference until the Senate shall have some understanding about it.

Mr. THURMAN. I was going to present two memorials on the subject; and when I shall have done that I will yield to whatever may be the wish of the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not mean to express any objection. I simply think that this is a matter that the Senate ought to pass upon before it goes to a committee of conference. The House amendment should either be referred to the committee that originally reported the bill or an opportunity should be had to discuss it in the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. I think it ought to go upon the Calendar and the Senate should have an opportunity to pass upon the question. I have no objection, however, to referring the amendment of the House to the committee that originally reported the bill, if that be desired.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no objection to that; but I do not think the amendment should be agreed to or sent to a committee of conference without some discussion and a fair understanding of what the amendment is.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have carefully read the substitute of the House of Representatives. There is only one single point in it on which the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] desires to take the vote of the Senate, and that is the amendment offered by his colleague in the House, [Mr. WHEELER.] With that exception the two bills are almost identical.

Mr. SARGENT. That is a very important amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know it is; but it is an amendment that simply delays the taking possession of the Louisville Canal for two years. That is the main trouble.

Mr. SARGENT. That is very true; but without that amendment we do not know what we are taking possession of. It seems to me that the matter had better be considered in the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to present to the Senate some resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Cincinnati on this subject, and then I have an observation to make. The resolutions are short, and I can read them probably in as short time as I can state them:

CINCINNATI CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Merchants' Exchange, March 28, 1874.

At a regular session of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, held this day, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas we learn from the dispatches from Washington that members of the Committee on Commerce are not favorable to the Government taking possession of the Louisville and Portland Canal until further legislation on the part of the State of Kentucky; and whereas the action of the Kentucky Legislature heretofore was intended to and does cede the property to the United States upon the sole condition that the debts be provided for; and whereas we have good reason to believe that objection to immediate action on the part of Congress is inspired directly or indirectly by parties at Louisville who gain advantages by retaining control of the canal; and whereas the Kentucky Legislature will not meet again for two years, and the commerce of the Ohio River having already been too long oppressed by the heavy tolls collected on a canal owned virtually by the Government of the United States: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, That simple justice to the commerce of the Ohio Valley requires that the Government should take immediate possession of the canal and reduce the tolls.

"Resolved, That copies of these proceedings be transmitted to our Representatives from this county, and also to Senators SHERMAN and THURMAN."

S. F. COVINGTON,
President.

I also present the following resolution, adopted by the same chamber of commerce yesterday:

Senator SHERMAN or THURMAN:

At the regular meeting of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, held this day, the following preamble and resolution were unanimously adopted, and I was instructed to telegraph the same to the Senators from Ohio:

"Whereas the effect of the Wheeler amendment, embodied in the House bill, providing for the control of the Louisville and Portland Canal by the Government of the United States, insures the continuance of the existing oppressive toll for two years at least; and whereas the charge of fifty cents per ton for passing through the canal is especially oppressive, in view of the fact that freights are carried by water from the city to New Orleans at two to four dollars per ton: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, That the United States Senate be, and it is hereby, respectfully requested, in behalf of the commerce of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers and tributaries, and in advancement of the cause of cheap transportation, to reject the amendment ingrafted upon the bill on motion of Mr. WHEELER, and cause the same to be passed in such a shape as to insure the immediate control of the canal by the Government and a reduction of the tolls, so as to place this improvement on an equal footing with other canals controlled by the United States."

Very respectfully,

S. F. COVINGTON,
President.

Mr. President, I am totally at a loss to understand the opposition to this bill. I do not know any subject that has been more thoroughly discussed in the Senate except some subject of great public character and importance; and this may be said to be a subject of that kind, because it affects the commerce of the entire Ohio Valley, and to a large extent that of the Mississippi Valley. Why there should be any opposition, the Government owning all the stock of this company but $500—I believe that is true——

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. And the objection being of the merest technical character in the world, such as in a suit between individuals no court of equity would regard for one moment; why the commerce of that valley should continue to be burdened with a tax of fifty cents a ton, when it is admitted on all hands that ten cents a ton would be amply sufficient to keep the canal in perfect repair, is past my comprehension; and why this objection should come as it does from quarters in nowise interested in this subject, I really do not understand.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask the Senator from Ohio if ten cents a ton will keep the canal in repair, and pay the interest on a million and a quarter of dollars that the Government will be required to pay in order to obtain possession of the bonds—the indebtedness of the canal company?

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot answer that question, for I am not as well advised about it as my colleague is who has looked more into the figures; but certainly it requires nothing like fifty cents, nor the half of fifty cents, a ton to pay the interest as well as to keep that canal in repair. But it is Government property, and what the Government ought to do, irrespective of what it owes, is to reduce the tolls on that canal to the very lowest sum which will keep it in repair, and then it will have done less for the commerce of the Ohio River than it has done for the commerce of almost any other great water-channel in the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say again that the only difference between the amendment of the House of Representatives and the bill of the Senate is, that upon the motion of a member of the House an amendment was stuck on here requiring the assent of the Legislature of Kentucky to what Kentucky has already assented to; that is, the cession of jurisdiction over this canal. There would be no objection to the adoption of the amendment if the Legislature of Kentucky were in session. If the House had passed this bill when it was sent there from the Senate, the Legislature of Kentucky was then in session and could have promptly given the requisite assent; but the Legislature——

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me finish my sentence. The Legislature of Kentucky has adjourned and will not convene again for two years under their constitution; and in the mean time the commerce of the Ohio River, which, as shown by recent statistics, is more than double the whole commerce of the United States with foreign countries, will be clamped with a tax of fifty cents a ton on every boat-load of coal, salt, and all the interior productions of the country. While I do not object to any reasonable delay that Senators may desire, yet the interests of my constituents are so affected, and the interests of all the States in that region of the country, including Kentucky, (because they are as deeply interested as we are in this matter,) that I hope the Senate will give us a vote upon it. My impression is that by a committee of conference this very objectionable amendment might be retained, but in such a way as not to prevent the taking possession of the canal by the United States. I am inclined to think that a committee of conference would report an amendment which would cover the point of controversy and would receive the unanimous vote of both Houses.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] who takes an interest in this matter, is absent, and it had better go over or be placed on the Calendar until that Senator shall be present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose we cannot object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter may be laid aside informally.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill and amendment will lie on the table. Petitions and memorials are now in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I present a petition signed by W. S. Johnson, M. D., and three others of the town of Milton, and of two others of the town of Chelsea, Vermont, who ask to have the stamp or proprietary act so altered or regulated as to exempt all physicians in possession of a medical diploma, or being lawfully licensed, from using stamps on any medicine that they may manufacture, vend, or dispose of, and that all pretenders who manufacture and vend a substance called medicine shall use stamps as heretofore and also pay a manufacturing license of ten to fifty dollars and a trading license of twenty or one hundred dollars. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN. I present the petition of the survivors of the Polaris; and as it is the practice sometimes to read petitions, I ask consent to briefly refer to this one. The petitioners say:

We parted from the ship in or about latitude 78° 28′ north on the night of the 15th day of October, 1872, and were on the ice floe one hundred and ninety-six days, exposed to all the rigors of an arctic winter, without adequate food, clothing, or shelter, constantly in imminent danger and peril of our lives, expecting never to reach our homes or see our friends; our sufferings, both physical and mental, were terrible, and so great that no language we can use will describe our agony during a long and desolate arctic night, (the sun not appearing for ninety consecutive days.) Once by a heavy swell dashing against the floe during the night of April 19, 1873, we were washed into the sea, and our escape from immediate death was miraculous, and at this time our supply of provisions got so low that we were obliged to be put on an allowance of one-quarter of a pound of bread and two ounces of meat per diem for several months, and at times we suffered greatly from hunger. We were rescued from our perilous position by the Newfoundland steamer Tigress on the 30th day of April, 1873.

We are still suffering in body, our health ruined, our means exhausted, and nothing left to support and sustain us, unless your honorable body grants us relief; and as we were employed by the Government for a voyage full of peril and danger, with a small recompense, to wit, twenty-five dollars per month, (when the pay at that time in the merchant service was forty dollars per month,) and with the assurance of Captain Hall and others interested in getting up the expedition that we should be liberally dealt with by the Government upon our return, if ever, we pray your honorable body to grant us and those other survivors of our expedition such relief and aid as shall be just and proper in the premises. And in this connection we would not forget "Esquimaux Joe" and "Hannah" his wife, who are now invalided, probably permanently, on account of the hardships and exposures of the expedition, and in particular we pray your honorable body that they should be liberally dealt with, as through God we believe we are indebted to them for the preservation of our lives.

In connection with this petition I also present a preamble and resolution adopted by the American Geographical Society, asking that the survivors of the Polaris be paid an extra sum, and also a letter of the Secretary of the Navy on the same subject. I move the reference of all these papers to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHURZ presented the petition of Horatio S. Chalmers and others, heirs of John Chalmers, sr., praying indemnification for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present the petition of Mercy Ann Hall, the widow of Charles F. Hall who died while in the service of the United States in command of the Polaris expedition. The petitioner sets out the services of her husband; that before he died he succeeded in carrying the flag farther north than man had ever before penetrated; that his life has been laid down for the common weal just as if he had fallen in battle; that his death left her destitute with two children, aged respectively seventeen and thirteen years, to support; that he died while in the service of the United States in command of the Polaris expedition. In presenting this petition, I desire simply to say that, in my judgment, a stronger appeal could not be made to the mercy and charity of the Government of the United States. This gentleman died while in the service of the Government upon a most dangerous voyage, leaving a widow and children without means of support. Their case is one that will appeal to the private feelings of any one who knows the circumstances. This petition is not only signed by the lady herself, but by Joseph Henry, Professor Baird, and a number of other gentlemen connected with scientific pursuits, W. T. Sherman, General of the Army, W. W. Corcoran, General Meigs, and a great many other citizens of this city. I move its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORDON presented a petition of James S. Herron and others, praying that a pension be granted to Fannie M. Herron; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BOGY presented a resolution of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of the establishment of a daily mail each way between Cairo, Illinois, and Poplar Bluff, Missouri, over the Cairo, Arkansas and Texas Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HAGER presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the appointment of a commission to ascertain the amount of property destroyed by Captain Jack's band of Modocs; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 586) to create a port of delivery at Helena, in the State of Arkansas, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2692) to change the name of the schooner-yacht Quarantine to Welcome, reported it without amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. Yesterday the Senate referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads a resolution of the Legislature of Missouri in favor of establishing a daily mail on one of the railroads of that State. The matter belongs entirely to the jurisdiction of the Postmaster-General. I therefore ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution and that it be referred to the Post-Office Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. RAMSEY. There was also referred to the same committee a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin for an increase of mail service. That belongs to the jurisdiction of the Post-Office Department, and I ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Post-Office Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 123) to provide for the transmission of correspondence by telegraph, have directed me to report it back and to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. RAMSEY. In lieu of it the committee direct me to report a bill to provide for the transmission of correspondence by telegraph, accompanied with a report, which I ask to have printed.

The bill (S. No. 651) to provide for the transmission of correspondence by telegraph was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In connection with that report I desire to say, as one member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads, that I do not concur in it and shall oppose the bill whenever it comes up.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 425) for the restoration to market of certain lands in the Territory of Utah, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1223) granting a pension to Mary Storrs, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 280) granting a pension to Ann Crane, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FLANAGAN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 434) referring to the Court of Claims for adjudication and determination the claim of the parties therein named, for the past and future use of Norton's post-marking and post-canceling hand-stamp, and of Robertson's improved hand-stamp, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Jane M. Rudolph, widow of Captain Thomas C. Rudolph, formerly of the United States revenue marine, praying for a pension, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of E. M. Dennison, of the District of Columbia, praying for extra compensation as crier of court, from April, 1863, to December, 1865, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 753) for the relief of Peter S. Patton, reported it with an amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1949) granting a pension to Ann M. Brackett, reported it without amendment.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2098) granting a pension to Mrs. Nancy Parkhurst, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of George W. Trueheart, late private Company F, Sixty-seventh Regiment New York Volunteers, praying an increase of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth Davis, a citizen of Maine, praying that she may be restored to a pension on account of the services of her son, William L. Davis, late Company E, Twentieth Regiment Maine Volunteers, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Ira W. Douthart, late of Company D, Thirteenth Regiment Iowa Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 26th ultimo, approved and signed the act (S. No. 583) making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the Joint Select Committee to Inquire into the Affairs of the District of Columbia.

COMMENCEMENT OF INCREASED PENSIONS.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2456) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1873, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report the same back with an amendment, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting a substitute. I ask for the present consideration of this bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The amendment of the Committee on Pensions was to strike out all after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That where an increase of pension is provided for in the last clause of section 4 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1873, the increase therein contemplated, as often as it shall occur, shall commence from the date of the examining surgeon's certificate that first showed increased disability; but all such surgeons' certificates under which an increase of pension is claimed, shall be subject to revision by the Commissioner of Pensions as contemplated in the act of which this is an amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish the Senator to explain to us the effect of this proposition.

Mr. PRATT. I will. The last proviso of section 4 of the general pension law reads as follows:

Provided further, That, except in case of permanent specific disabilities, no increase of pension shall be allowed to commence prior to the date of the examining surgeon's certificate.

Now, as the Senator from New York very well knows, a man is placed on the pension-roll for disability incurred in the service; he is then rated at one-half disability, say four dollars a month; afterward his disability is increased, and this is established by the report to the Pension Office of the examining surgeon in his neighborhood. Sometimes that report is not acted upon for months, and, under the law as it stands, his increase of pension commences only from the time of the final decision of the Pension Office. The effect of this amendment is to make the increase of pension relate back to the date of the examining surgeon's certificate establishing the increased disability.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator be kind enough to read the proviso again?

Mr. PRATT. The proviso in the existing law, as it occurs in the fourth section of the act of 1873, is:

Provided further, That, except in cases of permanent specific disabilities, no increase of pension shall be allowed to commence prior to the date of the examining surgeon's certificate.

It cannot under the existing law, nor can it by this amendment commence prior to the certificate of the examining surgeon; but under the present ruling of the Pension Office it does not commence until the final action of that office upon the surgeon's certificate.

Mr. CONKLING. There is nothing in that proviso to sustain that ruling. That proviso is that in cases of total or specific disability the Pension Office shall not go back to a period anterior to the surgeon's certificate.

Mr. PRATT. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. There is nothing there which forbids it going back to that time, or directs the Pension Bureau to fix it at the time when the action at the Pension Bureau shall occur.

Mr. PRATT. The practice in point of fact, however, is to increase the pension from the time that the report of the examining surgeon is finally acted upon at the Pension Office; and it was thought by the committee that it was proper that the pension should relate back to the date of the examining surgeon's certificate establishing the increased disability. That is the whole of it.

Mr. RAMSEY. What is the action of the House?

Mr. PRATT. My substitute makes the matter a little clearer than the House bill. I prepared this substitute under the advice of the Commissioner of Pensions. I will read his letter. It is brief:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 25, 1874.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 24th instant, requesting my opinion as to the advisability of amending the last proviso to the fourth section of the act of March 8, 1873, to make it read as follows—

Then he quotes the House bill—

I have the honor to state that there does not appear to be any important objection to the subject-matter of this amendment.

It is respectfully suggested, however, that the subject, instead of being retained as a proviso to the fourth section, should constitute a separate section.

It is important that the portion of the proviso that gives the Commissioner of Pensions power to revise the certificates of examining surgeons should be retained.

The experience of the office shows that the ratings of the same disability by different surgeons vary so widely, that uniformity in the ratings for disability can only be attained by subjecting the certificates of examining surgeons to revision in the Pension Office.

The statement of the fact that there are about fifteen hundred examining surgeons connected with this office, and the fact that the question of the rate of disability is one which cannot be subjected to any fixed rules, will show the necessity which exists for such revision.

Uniformity can only be attained by subjecting the certificates to revision by persons in this office who endeavor to keep the same standard of disability constantly in view.

Very respectfully,

J. H. BAKER,
Commissioner.

Hon. D. D. PRATT,
Chairman of the Committee on Pensions, United States Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not rise to object to the provision proposed by the Senator from Indiana, but I desire to ask him whether the proposed change will not subject the office of the Commissioner of Pensions to a revision of all the pensions that have been granted, where they have been granted at a date subsequent to the date of the surgeon's certificate?

Mr. PRATT. No, sir; it does not have that effect. He has now a supervision over the reports of the examining surgeons. Let me read the concluding part of this proviso of the fourth section:

That, except in cases of permanent specific disabilities, no increase of pension shall be allowed to commence prior to the date of the examining surgeon's certificate; and that in this as well as all other cases the certificate of an examining surgeon, or of a board of examining surgeons, shall be subject to the approval of the Commissioner of Pensions.

He has that power now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator does not seem to understand what I am driving at. My point is to ascertain whether, in regard to pensions that have been granted after twenty days, fifty days, or one hundred days, subsequent to the date of the surgeon's certificate, the Pension Office will not be called upon again to readjudicate all those cases?

Mr. PRATT. I am not prepared to say whether that result will follow or not. This measure is one of obvious propriety. An examining surgeon certifies to an increased disability, and that certificate is subsequently reviewed at the Pension Office and is approved. Now, under the existing law, the pensioner gets his pension only from the date of the decision of the office approving the report of the examining surgeon. The increased pension does not relate back to the time when the increased disability is proved by that certificate.

That is the whole of this amendment, simply to give the pensioner the benefit of the difference between the time when the examining surgeon certified and the Pension Office approved his report.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. But I think it is obvious that if we pass this section, we ought to pass a law increasing the force of the Pension Office by at least fifty clerks.

Mr. PRATT. The Senator has heard the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions. He does not seem to anticipate any trouble of that sort, and he approves of this amendment of the law.

Mr. CONKLING. There is one respect in which there is a remarkable resemblance between pension laws and all other laws, and that is the value of certainty and stability. Now, if I comprehend the force of this measure at all, there are beyond the suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont two or three serious objections to it, and although I do not value any opinion of my own upon this subject as much asI do that of the Senator from Indiana, I venture to make to him two or three suggestions.

This is to be an amendment of an existing act, an act approved on the 3d of March, 1873, and the provision is "the increase of pensions therein contemplated, as often as it shall occur, shall commence from the date of the examining surgeon's certificate that first shows increased disablity." Now, before considering the effect of that, let us observe the present condition of the law. It contains no provision whatever against this very rule. It simply provides that the increased pension in these cases shall not date back of the surgeon's certificate. It does not declare that it may not go back as far as that, or as near that date as the Commissioner of Pensions may fix. Now comes a requirement that in all cases contemplated by the act of 1873, the pension shall thus date back. Therefore the Senator from Vermont is quite right in his suggestion; and there is no answer to it unless it be that the Commissioner of Pensions hereafter is to date back to the certificate of disability and there stop. What shall we have then? Every pensioner crying out, and justly so, that he is the subject of injustice. Why? Because every man whose case is adjudicated after this act shall pass, although adjudicated under a law which has existed for more than a year, is put upon a footing more favorable than he who upon the same state of case and with the same equities had his case adjudicated yesterday or on any prior day. The injustice of that the Pension Bureau and Congress cannot resist; and accordingly, as the Senator from Vermont suggests, this is to be an edict for a general revision and resettlement of all the cases "contemplated," in the language of this amendment, by the act of 1873.

But, Mr. President, that is not all. As often as the increase shall occur, it is to commence "from the date of the examining surgeon's certificate that first shows increased disability." What is to be the effect of that? Here comes a certificate from an examining surgeon. On its face, or by reason of facts which the Commissioner learns otherwise, there is reason to distrust it; no increase occurs. At a subsequent time the Commissioner of Pensions is satisfied that an increase should take place. Then what will be the effect under this? That increase must go back to the first certificate of an examining surgeon that showed this disability. There is to be a second revision of all these cases.

Mr. President, every time we change the pension laws, and every time we propose to change them, an immense amount of agitation and disturbance takes place; and if the correspondence of other Senators on this subject is anything like mine, they will understand the truth of which I speak; and it seems to me that such a provision as this, if now adopted, will start up a question in every case covered by the act of 1873 which has been adjudicated, and in every such case which awaits adjudication.

I asked the Senator from Indiana to repeat his reading of the provision in the act of 1873, in order that we might be sure that there was nothing there which prevented the discretion and judgment of the Commissioner of Pensions going back to the certificate, if he saw fit to do so; and the Senator assents to my assertion that there is nothing of that sort in the act. Therefore, as the law stands now, the Commissioner is clothed with the discretion and the jurisdiction to have the pension date from the first certificate, or the first one which satisfies him of the increased disability. The very fact that this provision is here shows that that has not been his rule of action in all cases, but that governed by his judgment and the facts of the case he has had it antedated more or less, depending upon the merits of the case. Now, we propose to say that it not only shall go back in all cases to the time when a certificate satisfies him of the disability, but that it shall go behind that, hit or miss, to that certificate, be it satisfactory or otherwise, be it true or false, which first showed an increase of disability.

My impression is that my honorable friend from Indiana, to whom we are so much indebted for the care and discrimination he gives to these cases, would do himself and us and the Treasury a favor if he would allow this bill to lie or to go back to his committee to consider whether really it is necessary to uproot all these cases when professedly there is no provision of law restraining the Pension Bureau from doing full justice in every case which the Commissioner thinks calls for this measure of justice rather than for another.

Mr. PRATT. If after I shall have answered some of the objections of my friend from New York he should prefer to make a motion to recommit this bill for further consideration to the committee, certainly I shall not oppose it, although it was considered quite fully in the committee and quite recently. It will be remembered that the law which is now sought to be amended was passed only a little upward of a year since, on the 3d of March, 1873; and consequently the increase to the pensioners cannot amount to a great deal during that short period of time. If in every case of increased disability the increased pension were to relate back to the time of the surgeon's certificate, it would not amount, I say, to a very great sum, because the law has been in force but little upward of one year.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me, I ask if it is not true that under that law, which was virtually retroactive because it related to disabilities which had occurred before the passage of the act as well as to those which should occur afterward, a great number of cases have undergone the action of the Pension Bureau, many thousand cases.

Mr. PRATT. I dare say a great many cases have occurred since the 3d of March, 1873; but I wish to call the Senator's attention now to the absolute justice of the provisions of this bill.

A man is admitted to the pension-roll, but his disability is rated at only one-fourth; he draws, therefore, but two dollars per month pension. He goes with his wounds, to the nearest examining surgeon, and the surgeon, after examining him, promptly reports to the Pension Office that the man is entitled to a pension for a total disability, or for a disability of one-half, or for a disability of three-fourths, as the case may be, and that his pension ought to be increased accordingly. That report is not acted upon here at the Pension Office for months afterward; and when the report is examined it is approved. Then under the present practice the pension is increased to date from the approval by the Commissioner of Pensions and does not go back a day. That is the mischief which is sought to be remedied.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like at that point to ask two questions: first, how does it happen that it takes months to adjudicate a case so plain as that which the Senator states; and, second, by virtue of what law is it that the Commissioner of Pensions feels himself constrained, in a case which he is satisfied is meritorious and truthful, to fix the day when he acts, rather than the date of the certificate, as the day on which the pension is to commence?

Mr. PRATT. In the first place, the honorable Senator will remember that there are nearly two hundred thousand pensioners, and there will of course proceed from different portions of the country a great number of cases every day in the year, and those cases cannot always be considered promptly when they reach the office. It takes time to examine these reports, and a conclusion may not be reached for weeks and months after the report of the examining surgeon is received. That is the fact. Were it not so, this amendment of the law would not be needed.

Now, as to the construction which the Commissioner of Pensions places on the law, that is his business, not ours. He has placed that construction. I think he would have done no injustice to the law if he had ruled otherwise, and when he approved the report of the examining surgeon he had made the increased pensions relate back to the date of the certificate. But the fact that he does not, that this is not the practice of the office, is the occasion of this class of pensioners coming to Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. But if my friend will pardon me again, this bill is not intended to remedy the evil he speaks of now and stop there. This bill makes it mandatory on the Commissioner not only to antedate the pension, but in all cases to carry it back to the first certificate, not the certificate that he approves as the Senator says now, but the first certificate, of an examining surgeon coming from no matter where, which shows the disability. Thus he is entirely deprived of all power and discretion when he comes to a case where he is satisfied that the first certificate showing this increased disability was a faulty and unreliable certificate. He does not approve it; he disapproves it; but still the mandate of this law requires him to date back the pension to that time.

As I have interrupted the Senator I beg leave to make one other remark. He said a moment ago that this act having passed only a little more than a year ago, there could not be a great number of these cases to be revised; it could not lead to a very great amount of work; and yet now he tells us, using two hundred thousand for illustration, that there are so many pensioners, (thereby meaning pensioners under this increase of pension or else it has nothing to do with it,) that two, three, or four months, I think he said, sometimes elapsed before action. If the Senator is right now, if that is the measure of the increase which has occurred under the act of 1873, he will see that two things follow: first that this is an enormous increase of the pension-roll in money; and second an enormous provision in respect of the labor which will be required to revise all these cases so multitudinous that he says they pile up until three or four months are necessary to reach each particular case.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont May I ask the Senator from New York if he does not think we shall have a large amount of increase of business on the part of Congress provided we undertake to correct the blunders of every officer who administers the law?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, I do; and I think further, if I am not interrupting my friend from Indiana too much, that the most that can be called for here is a declaratory act which shall say to the Commissioner of Pensions that the existing law does not forbid him to go back to the certificate. I cannot comprehend how this section which has been read can be construed otherwise; but if there is any doubt, remove that doubt. As the Senator from Vermont says, if we undertake now, speaking back, to say that all these pensions shall be put back to the first certificate showing a disability, it seems to me we enter upon a thing which will give great trouble in the end, not only to the Commissioner and to the Treasury, but to ourselves.

Mr. PRATT. I do not rise to protract this debate. I will note simply one point made by the Senator from New York. If he had read the substitute carefully which the committee have adopted in place of the House bill, he would have found that the Commissioner does not absolutely act upon the report of the examining surgeon and necessarily increase the amount of the pension to accord with the increased disability, but he must first approve that report of the examining surgeon before any increase of pension takes place.

Mr. CONKLING. And yet the words are "that the pension shall commence from the date of the examining surgeon's certificate that first shows an increased disability."

Mr. PRATT. Now read the balance.

Mr. CONKLING. "But all such surgeons' certificates under which an increase of pension is claimed shall be subject to revision by the Commissioner of Pensions as contemplated in the act of which this is an amendment."

Mr. PRATT. Precisely.

Mr. CONKLING. The effect of which language, as I understand it, is inevitably that although the Commissioner may still determine whether an increase of pension shall take place or not, when he does thus determine, he is tied up to a certain date of commencement, which date is the date of the first surgeon's certificate that shows such increased disability.

Mr. PRATT. Certainly, if that certificate is true and meets his approval.

Mr. CONKLING. There is nothing in the bill that says that.

Mr. PRATT. However, I shall not oppose the motion of the Senator from New York to recommit this bill if he thinks that the bill is not sufficiently guarded. Does he make that motion?

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest that it be recommitted, as the Senator has no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS RECOMMITTED.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents to move to recommit to that committee the bill (S. No. 119) for the better security of property in patterns for metal castings.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to move that House bill No. 1950, granting a pension to Betsie Lewis, be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. I think I have the assent of the members of the committee to make that motion. It is a bill reported adversely four or five days ago.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOGY. I move that House bill No. 294, for the relief of Joab Bagley, reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims a few days ago, be recommitted to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 652) conferring exclusive jurisdiction over Indian reservations upon the United States courts, and for the punishment of crimes by and against Indians; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BOREMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 653) for the relief of E. Boyd Pendleton, late collector of internal revenue, fifth district of Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 654) to extend the time for the completion of the railroad from the Saint Croix River or Lake, between sections 25 and 31, to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield, in the State of Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 655) to enable the Mennonites from Russia to effect permanent settlement on the public lands of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 656) to incorporate the Colorado Canal and Irrigation Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CORPORATIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I submit an amendment to House bill No. 2423, explanatory of an act entitled "An act to provide for the creation of corporations in the District of Columbia by general law," which came over the other day and was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I move that the amendment be printed and referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

ASBURY DICKINS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. WEST. I believe that the first bill on the Calendar is the bill for the relief of the legatees of Asbury Dickins, which has already occupied the Senate two days in the discussion of it to the exclusion of much other matter upon the Calendar; and in order that the Calendar may be proceeded with, I move that that bill lie on the table.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator will not do that. It has occupied the morning hour for less than twenty minutes altogether and in legitimate debate in the morning hour. This morning has been entirely wasted in the discussion of a bill which has been sent back to the committee.

Mr. WEST. If the Chair permits debate on the question, we might as well now have it for the two and a half minutes left of the morning hour.

Mr. ANTHONY. I shall have to call for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. WEST. I insist on the motion to lay on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana moves to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 1580) for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to submit some remarks to the Senate on the merits of the claim, and I cannot do it in the brief space allowed this morning. There is only a minute left.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator from Indiana will be indulged. He is one of the minority of the committee that made the report, and I hope he will be allowed to make his remarks. They will be but a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Indiana be permitted to submit his remarks on this bill without being interrupted by the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to object, but there is only one minute left of the morning hour.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator from Indiana prefer to go on to-day?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly he does.

Mr. CONKLING. He has not said so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is that the Senator from Indiana be permitted to proceed notwithstanding the expiration of the morning hour. Is there objection to that proposition?

Mr. CONKLING. Is that request made by the Senator from Rhode Island or the Senator from Indiana?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was made by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Indiana has chosen to speak through the Senator from Rhode Island, he has selected certainly a very judicious attorney.

Mr. PRATT. I want to be considered simply as having the floor, so that I can present my views to the Senate in the morning hour to-morrow.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

BANKING AND CURRENCY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. No. 617) to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes and for free banking.

Mr. MERRIMON. I desire to offer a substitute for section 3 of the bill, as follows:

That $46,000,000 in United States notes for circulation, in addition to such circulation now allowed by law, shall be issued to national banking associations now organized, and which may be organized hereafter; and such increased circulation shall be distributed among the several States as provided in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

Mr. CONKLING. May we inquire to what is that offered as an amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A substitute for the third section of the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask what became of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] to strike out the third section and put it back with the word "the" inserted at a certain point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from North Carolina is in order if moved as a motion to amend the proposition of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state to the Senate my purpose, and it is to withdraw my amendment to the third section so as to allow the substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina to be voted on. I have become satisfied that there are a few Senators who have been voting with us for an increase of the currency who are not prepared to vote for free banking on either of the bases that have been proposed, and those Senators not voting with us leaves the matter so close that it might put the bill in jeopardy when it comes into the Senate. For that reason I am willing to withdraw my amendment to the third section, and am ready to vote for the substitute of the Senator from North Carolina, that this question may be ended without further discussion and without further delay, and the country may at least know what we intend to do. For that reason I withdraw my amendment in favor of the substitute of the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois withdraws his amendment, and the Senator from North Carolina moves to strike out the third section of the bill and insert what has been read in lieu thereof.

Mr. MERRIMON. Let the words be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be inserted in lieu of section 3, as follows:

That $46,000,000 in notes for circulation, in addition to such circulation now allowed by law, shall be issued to national banking associations now organized or which may be organized hereafter; and such increased circulation shall be distributed among the several States as provided in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina a slight addition to his proposition, in some such form as this:

Provided, That the computation of wealth and business in each State upon which national banking capital is to be apportioned shall be computed by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1875, from the best data that can be procured.

Mr. MERRIMON. I intend to accept that suggestion as a part of the substitute I offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let it be reduced to writing and sent to the desk. Will the Senator from Indiana reduce it to writing?

Mr. MORTON. I will withdraw the proposition now and present it hereafter in proper form when reduced to writing.

Mr. DAVIS. Is any amendment pending to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana offered an amendment, but asked time to draw it up.

Mr. MORTON. I withdraw it for the present. I will offer it subsequently.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no amendment pending to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I offer an amendment to that amendment, to be added thereto:

Provided, That no interest shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury after the passage of this act on the bonds which have been or shall be deposited in the Treasury to secure the circulation of any banking association, except on the excess of the par value of such bonds over the average circulation of such association during the current year, while such bonds shall remain on deposit in the Treasury to secure such circulation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer the following as a substitute for that amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. I move to strike out all of his amendment after the word "that," and insert the following:

So much of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," as provides that no circulation shall be withdrawn, under the provisions of section 6 of said act, until after the fifty-four millions granted in section 1 of said act shall have been taken up, is hereby repealed; and it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to proceed forthwith to carry into execution the provisions of section 6 of said act; and to enable him to do so, he is hereby authorized and required, from time to time, as needed for the execution of the said section, to make requisitions upon each of the national banks described in said section, organized in States having an excess of circulation, to withdraw and return so much of their circulation as by said act may be apportioned to be withdrawn from them, or, in lieu thereof, to deposit in the Treasury of the United States lawful money sufficient to redeem such circulation, and upon the return of the circulation required, or the deposit of lawful money, as herein provided, a proportionate amount of the bonds held to secure the circulation of such association as shall make such return or deposit shall be surrendered to it.

That upon the failure of the national banks upon which requisition for circulation shall be made, or of any of them, to return the amount required, or to deposit in the Treasury lawful money to redeem the circulation required, within thirty days, the Comptroller of the Currency shall at once sell, as provided in section 49 of the national currency act approved June 3, 1864, bonds held to secure the redemption of the circulation of the association or associations which shall so fail, to an amount sufficient to redeem the circulation required of such association or associations, and with the proceeds, which shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, so much of the circulation of such association or associations shall be redeemed as will equal the amount required and not returned; and if there be any excess of proceeds over the amount required for such redemption, it shall be returned to the association or associations whose bonds shall have been sold. And it shall be the duty of the Treasurer, assistant treasurers, designated depositaries, and national-bank depositaries of the United States, (who shall be kept informed by the Comptroller of the Currency of such associations as shall fail to return circulation or to deposit lawful money as required,) to assort and return to the Treasury for redemption the notes of such associations as shall come into their hands until the amount required shall be redeemed.

That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Currency to issue circulating notes in the manner and proportion now provided by law, to associations organized or to be organized in those States and Territories having less than their proportion of circulation, under an apportionment made on the basis of population and of wealth, as shown by the returns of the census of 1870: Provided, That the whole amount of circulation issued to such banking associations, and withdrawn and redeemed from banking associations under the provisions of this act, shall not exceed $50,000,000, and that such circulation shall from time to time be withdrawn and redeemed only as it shall be necessary to supply banks in those States having less than their apportionment.

This amendment offered by me is precisely the bill reported by the Committee on Finance originally transferring $25,000,000 from the States having an excess to the States West and South that have less than their proportion under the act of July 12, 1870, with this exception, that I have stricken out "twenty-five" and inserted "fifty," so as to transfer $50,000,000 from the States having an excess to the States having less than their proportion. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina adds $46,000,000 to the present volume of national-bank currency. By the amendment which I offer it is proposed to give the South and the West—and to this point I call the attention of Senators from the South and West—more than the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. It will give an additional circulation to the South and West of $4,000,000 over and above the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina, so that I cannot see how the South and West can object to it, inasmuch as they get more by this amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON. May I ask the Senator from West Virginia a question?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. How much circulation will it add to the country?

Mr. DAVIS. It will give to the country that my friend is from and to all other parts of the country that want additional banking circulation $4,000,000 more than he asks for in his amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON. How much will it add to the general circulation of the whole country?

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer in a moment. If my friend is legislating for New England and not for his own section of country, then he is right in opposing this amendment; but if he is legislating to advance the interests of his own people, and if the rest of the gentlemen who represent the South and West are doing the same, then this amendment is to their advantage. My friend asks me how much it adds to the circulation of the entire country. He knows that as well as I can tell him. His desire is to call the attention of the Senate to it, I suppose, but I presume there no Senator here who does not know the answer to that question. He and I represent a constituency somewhat alike. They say they want more bank circulation; they want facilities which they cannot have under the present bank act. The amendment I offer will give them more than the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina by $4,000,000. It is plain to me that there is sufficient banking circulation now in the country. What is wanted is to have it properly distributed and properly located.

We have agreed to add $44,000,000 to the circulation of legal-tender notes. Now I propose to take from those States that have a very large excess of bank circulation $50,000,000 of that excess and transfer it to the States that have less than they are lawfully entitled to under the act of July 12, 1870. In that act Senators from the North and South and from the East and West, as I am told, for I was not here at the time, agreed that there should be a transfer on the basis of the census of 1870. It was agreed by the Senate generally that the North and East had more banking capital than they were entitled to on the basis of population and wealth, and that part of it should be transferred to the South and West. Now I propose in this amendment to carry out in good faith the act of July 12, 1870, and it will give to the section of the country where I live and where the western and southern members live more than the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina. Therefore I hope it will be adopted. I think it is just.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does my honorable friend understand that it is necessary, to carry out the act of 1870, which provided for a redistribution of $25,000,000, now to increase it to $50,000,000?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Good faith would not require that.

Mr. DAVIS. Good faith would require that the East and the North should transfer $25,000,000 to the South and the West. That is the law to-day. The only reason it has not been carried out is that the Comptroller of the Currency, instead of following the words the law uses, "when it is taken up," says he is waiting until all is issued of the $54,000,000 additional. I propose a transfer of $50,000,000, because I believe it is just that the South and West should have $50,000,000 instead of $25,000,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to make a further inquiry of the Senator. The Senate has agreed to an augmentation of the legal-tenders by an issue of $44,000,000 more. Now, will adding this $50,000,000 be satisfactory to those sections to which the $50,000,000 are to be given?

Mr. DAVIS. What is the question?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This proposition is to give those communities more currency. Is this done on the idea that having done it, this will be satisfactory to those communities?

Mr. DAVIS. I believe it would be to a great extent. There are some gentlemen who differ with me, however. My impression is that it would be just to them. They ought to have it, and therefore I am in hopes that the Senators North and South will agree to it.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator from West Virginia will allow me, I wish to understand this proposition. I want to discuss nothing this morning; I want to vote; but if I understand the proposition, it is, instead of increasing the bank currency $46,000,000, to transfer from the North and East $50,000,000 of what they already have, and it does not increase the currency a dollar. That is the proposition, is it not?

Mr. DAVIS. The North and East have to-day——

Mr. LOGAN. I understand what they have. I only ask the question.

Mr. DAVIS. I prefer to answer in my own way.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask if this is not a transfer instead of an increase of the currency?

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator is right about that, as he knows. But the North and East have now $124,000,000 of bank circulation in excess of what they are entitled to under the act of July 12, 1870. Out of that $124,000,000 I propose to transfer $50,000,000 to the South and West. That is the whole of it.

Mr. LOGAN. We do not want it that way. Let us vote.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator from Illinois says that this does not mean an increase of the currency but a transfer of the currency. The circumstance that it does not mean an increase of the currency recommends it to my vote. I do not like to vote for a measure of this sort at all; but since we have always been told that we are resisting accommodations to be given to the West and South, we desire to show to the Senate now that we do not resist any such measure at all. What we do resist is an increase of the currency without an efficient system of redemption. I shall therefore vote for this measure, although it does not in every respect meet my views.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. As I understand, the Senator from West Virginia offers this as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina; not as an addition to it, but striking it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is strike out and insert, as the Chair understands.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand the effect of this amendment is to transfer $50,000,000 from the States that have an excess of their proportion to the States that are below their proportion, and to make no addition to the currency. Is that the proposition?

Mr. DAVIS. That is it.

Mr. BOREMAN. I regard this proposition as a cheat and a delusion. The effort of what has been the majority on almost every vote here has been to increase the banking capital and circulation of the country. They believe that such an increase is needed for the business of the country, and they believe that a large majority of the people of the country demand such an increase. The proposition now submitted, as is understood by every one here, is not an increase of the banking capital or circulation one cent. It is an effort to take from these States that now have banks established and have more than their proportion of circulation under existing law, and are transacting their business upon that circulation, a portion of it and transfer it to those States that have less than their proportion.

Now, sir, those with whom I am acting on this floor propose national legislation. They do not propose to array one section of this country against another; they do not propose to impair the interests of one section for the benefit of another; but believing that an increase of the bank capital and circulation is a necessity, without interfering with the existing state of things to the prejudice of any section of the country, we wish to give that increase and to afford facilities to our constituents for the transaction of their business. This is in obedience, in my judgment, to the will of the people of this country. We are here, as I understand, to express that will. I suppose every gentleman believes that he is expressing what he regards as the will of his constituents, and is doing that which is best for the people of the country at large.

Now, sir, I cannot understand the tactics of my colleague on this floor in regard to the measure now before the Senate. I have not interfered in this business; I have been content to vote on the various propositions submitted, believing as I do that my constituents demand an increase of currency, not a transfer from other States. They are not controlled by such narrow and contracted views. They do not wish to impair the business efficiency and success of any particular section of this country; but they act upon broad national grounds, and believing that it is demanded, they wish an increase of the banking capital and circulation of this country so that they may transact their business with facility.

I say, sir, that I do not understand my colleague. Yesterday he offered a proposition here to increase the banking circulation more than $110,000,000, and to-day he opposes a proposition to increase it $46,000,000 by an effort by indirection to substitute a proposition simply to transfer instead of increasing the banking circulation of the country. These two movements cannot be reconciled. They are inconsistent. It is a sort of tactics that I cannot comprehend. I think there ought to be some consistency. I took great pleasure yesterday in voting for the proposition offered by my colleague to increase the banking capital of this country by more than $110,000,000; but I cannot go with him to-day in this side effort to defeat the proposition to increase $46,000,000.

We have seen that every proposition that has been offered here, except this one of the Senator from North Carolina, to increase the capital and circulation $46,000,000, has been defeated; and the friends of an increase of circulation have therefore come to the conclusion that the best they can do is to support the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina. They believe they can carry that proposition through the Senate. I believe so. I am satisfied of it from the votes that have been taken. But beyond that we cannot hope for success. Then why offer other propositions? When we were about to approach a vote on the $46,000,000 increase, when everybody seemed to be willing and ready to take that vote, here comes in this other delusive proposition in order to defeat the success of an increase of the banking capital of the country.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that a large majority of the people of West Virginia, whom I have the honor in part to represent here, demand an increase of the banking capital; not that it be taken from New England or elsewhere. They do not wish to create sectional jealousies and unkindness. On the contrary, they wish to cultivate friendly relations with all sections. They wish New England to make the most of the capital they have, but they wish to be themselves supplied with the requisite facilities for the transaction of business. Because our friends from New England here, by their votes and their course, do not aid us in securing what we desire, we are not, therefore, to be controlled by a narrow and contracted course and attempt to impair their business relations; but we expect to be able to overcome the opposition of our friends; we at least hope to do so, and I think if we may be now allowed to vote we shall show to our friends on the other side and to the country that we are able to approach something like what is just to the business interests of the country, and increase the banking capital to the amount of $46,000,000, at least, if we can do no more. The country demands it, in my judgment; the business of the country demands it.

All this talk about inflation is a scarecrow. Its only effect can be to delude and deceive. I do not mean to say that that is the purpose of Senators, but it must have that effect if it has any at all. Grown-up men who have lived to maturity in this country, and have participated in business transactions, are not to be frightened out of their propriety by this talk of inflation, "a sea of irredeemable paper without shore or bottom," and all that sort of stuff. We think we know what we need; we think we know what we are doing; and we are going to go as near to that thing as we can; that is, if we cannot get free banking, which I believe is the true policy of the country, we will take the next best thing and we will increase the banking capital $46,000,000. Free banking would relieve the present system of national banks from the charge of monopoly, which is the most potent complaint against it.

Now, sir, I advise the friends of an increase of banking circulation not to be deluded or deceived by the proposition offered by my colleague to transfer circulation from New England to the South and West, but to vote it down and come to the practical proposition which will, without any unkindness, without irritation, without injustice or unfairness to any, give us what we need and what our constituents wish.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall not reply to what my colleague has said in referring to the amendment that I have offered as "a cheat and a delusion." The proposition which I present is a measure which was reported by the Committee on Finance at this session, the only change I have made being to increase from $25,000,000, as proposed by them, to $50,000,000, the amount to be transferred from the North and East to the South and West. If there is any "cheat and delusion," therefore, it must have come from that committee; but I deem such remarks unworthy of reply.

It is true, as he has said, (and that was a legitimate argument,) that I voted yesterday for an increase of $110,000,000. I did so vote. It is well known to all Senators that at the time I offered the amendment to increase the national-bank circulation $110,000,000, which would be the result on the basis of Pennsylvania, there was then pending a proposition for $280,000,000 additional circulation. That is the explanation of the proposition for an increase of $110,000,000 which was voted for by my colleague and by myself yesterday.

As to the act of 1870, I shall not call it "a cheat and a delusion." I believe my colleague was here at the time it was passed, and for aught I know he voted for it. I cannot say whether he did or not; but it is very probable that he did, and now he terms it "a cheat and a delusion." I shall say no more.

Mr. BOREMAN. That was all right. I do not know whether I voted for it or not; very likely I did; and if we cannot get anything else here, if our friends from New England will not allow us to pass anything else, we may ultimately take that now; but in the present status of the matter pending here this proposition is calculated to cripple and mislead and defeat what the friends of the increase of circulation are after; that is, to give us more bank circulation. The vote in 1870 has nothing to do with the exact status of the proposition now before us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia has spoken ten minutes.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, I am not, like the Senator from West Virginia farthest from me [Mr. DAVIS,] legislating either for the West or the South or New England, but for the whole country; and in considering what is best to be done with regard to this amendment I try to consider the interests of the whole country. I can conceive of nothing in a financial point of view so disastrous to the interests of the whole country as any expansion of the currency; so that if upon the presentation of this substitute there was an absolute certainty that we had got to have either a transfer of national-bank currency to the amount of $50,000,000 from the Eastern to the Western and Southern States on the one hand, or an expansion of the currency to the amount of $46,000,000 on the other hand, I would vote to make the transfer. It would be a less evil than the expansion. But no such absolute alternative is as yet presented to us; and, therefore, upon the present substitute I shall vote as I believe to be right upon the question itself; and believing that such a transfer would be a violation of good faith in the object it attempted to accomplish, and, in the second place, a financial absurdity in itself, I shall vote against it in the present stage of the bill, and shall not vote for it under any circumstances until such an alternative is presented as I have indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SARGENT in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. MERRIMON.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Let the amendment be reported again.

Mr. LOGAN. It is very long. It is merely a provision for a transfer of circulation from the East to the West and South.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I will not ask for the reading of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when Mr. BAYARD's name was called) said: I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BAYARD] is sick and unable to be in the Senate. He is paired, however, with the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. RANSOM.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, Mr. DENNIS. I suppose he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea;" choosing this as a lesser evil than expansion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, (when his name was called.) On this and all kindred questions I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. SPRAGUE. If he were here he would vote "nay," I am advised; and I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, Mr. BAYARD, who is detained at home by sickness.

Mr. SCOTT, (when his name was called.) To avoid repetition I desire to say that wherever I have not voted on the bill I have considered myself paired with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON.] I should vote "yea" on this proposition.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 20, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Jones, Kelly, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Thurman, and Wadleigh—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Tipton, West, and Windom—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Chandler, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Gilbert, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Ransom, Scott, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, and Wright—21.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] to strike out the third section and insert a substitute; which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the words to be inserted, as follows:

That forty-six millions in notes for circulation, in addition to such circulation now allowed by law, shall be issued to national banking associations now organized and which may be organized hereafter; and such increased circulation shall be distributed among the several States as provided in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I indicated a purpose last evening to vote for a proposition to put free banking on the bill as it stands; and it may be remembered by some that I attempted to justify such a vote upon the ground that I thought free banking in itself was a proper thing, and if inserted upon a proper bill would be quite satisfactory to me. I intimated that possibly if it was put on this bill, unless the bill was largely modified, I should not vote for the bill.

Here is a proposition to put, not free banking on the bill, but a new restriction upon banking. As I do not like restricted banking, I am not very strongly induced to vote for this proposition, because I object to the bill as it stands and to the amendment that is offered. I do not like the proposition moved, because it is a new restriction upon banking. I do not like the bill upon which you put it, because that bill provides for an increase of the greenback circulation.

I have taken occasion to say several times during this long winter that there were communities here and there in the United States which asked, which required, additional banking facilities. I have said that there was capital ready to furnish those facilities if your law would allow them to be furnished. I should be glad to offer those facilities. I should be glad to see that law so modified. But, Mr. President, when we have another bank in the United States I want it to be a real bank; I want it to do the whole duty of a bank, a full-breasted, full-grown bank. If we have got to do business with corporations like those that now exist, corporations which we have got to sit up with nights and feed with greenback broth, I do not want any more of them.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina without at all committing myself to vote for the bill if that amendment be adopted, for if we are to have a bill of expansion without one single feature in it which looks like ever coming back to a sound basis for the currency, I shall vote against any such thing. But I can vote for this amendment, reserving the right to vote against the bill unless something shall be put into it which looks like saving us from a wholly irredeemable paper currency; and I can vote for it for this reason: We have had various propositions of inflation here; we have already agreed to inflate the greenback currency by the sum of $44,000,000. That is fixed. Then we had a proposition to inflate the national-bank currency on the basis of the State of Maine, which I believe would inflate between two hundred and sixty and two hundred and eighty million dollars; then on the basis of the State of Pennsylvania, which would inflate by the sum of $120,000,000 or thereabouts; then on the basis of the State of New York, which would inflate by the sum of $110,000,000. And now, if I may judge by what is said by one of the leaders of the inflationists, they have concluded to come down to the inflation proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, $46,000,000.

Well, I must say that this debate has not been without its effect, and that some good at least has resulted from it, when it has brought them down from $260,000,000 or $280,000,000 to the modest sum, in comparison with what has been heretofore urged, of $46,000,000. I can therefore vote to put that in the bill, reserving, as I said, my right to vote against the bill unless something shall be done toward preventing this country from being flooded for all time with a wholly irredeemable currency.

Sir, I derive some little consolation from the fact that the friends of this inflation, who see all the benefits that Heaven itself can bestow upon earth in an inflation of the currency, have so far rectified their views that they seem now to be willing to take one-sixth of what the day before yesterday or yesterday seemed to be their idea of what was necessary to cover this whole country with prosperity.

While I am on this subject I wish to say that I am very apprehensive that if this measure pass it will not have the effect which the mover of it expects. I certainly as much as any one wish to see the South and West benefited; I wish to see every part of the Union benefited; but I know that there are peculiar reasons why the southern part of this country should have the fostering care of the Government. No one feels those reasons more strongly than myself. But when we come to consider what will be the practical effect of this amendment should it be carried and become a law, I must confess that it appears to me that the South will probably derive very little benefit under it if the Comptroller of the Currency will be obliged to award banking facilities to the States that are deficient according to the degree of their deficiency.

Let us see what are the deficient States. That which is the most deficient is the State of Missouri. Her deficiency is $8,983,000, or in round numbers $9,000,000. Then comes the State of California, with $6,300,000; then Wisconsin, $5,700,000, I leave out the hundreds; then Tennessee, $5,300,000; Mississippi, $5,000,000; Georgia, $4,600,000; North Carolina, $4,600,000; Alabama, $4,200,000; Virginia, $4,100,000; Texas, $3,700,000; Arkansas, $2,900,000. I need not read further.

Now, what is the Comptroller of the Currency to do? The total amount of deficiency is $80,000,000. It is proposed to take $46,000,000 and give that to the States, pursuant to the provisions of the first section of the act of July 12, 1870, to provide for the redemption of the three per cents. How is he to distribute, I want to know? By what standard is he to distribute? Is he to fix an arbitrary standard of some State, and say that no State shall have any banking facilities until the State of Missouri has the full amount according to that standard which he shall adopt—some standard which bears about the same relation that $46,000,000 does to $80,000,000; for the deficiencies which I read are deficiencies which aggregate $80,000,000? Shall he take some standard such as the proportion that forty-six bears to eighty, and say that no State shall have any currency until Missouri, where the deficiency is greatest, shall have arrived up to that standard, and so on going step by step until all the deficient States have come up to that standard, or going a year without it have, under the provisions of this act, been deemed to refuse it? I do not understand from this amendment how the distribution is to be made; but if that shall be the distribution, my friends from the South will have to wait perhaps a long time before they get this addition of currency which they expect. But that is their lookout. I only mention it for the purpose of showing that if they want to have that relief down South which they say they need so much, they will perhaps have to find some other machinery in addition to that which is provided by this amendment.

Mr. MORTON. I do not care to discuss this question. I only say that the distribution will be apportioned among all the States in deficiency according to their deficiency. Of course it is not enough to meet all the deficiency. I wish it was more; but I ask a vote.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I have no doubt many sections of the country will be disappointed if they anticipate banking facilities and currency as it is proposed to have them distributed by this amendment. I believe it is true that money cannot go except where it is purchased by property. I understood some weeks since that the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] in speaking of the wants and necessities of Georgia, said that Georgia was poor. I am very sorry it is so; but I doubt not it is true, or he would not have stated it. Now I ask, if Georgia is poor, what object is it for any man or any association of men to go and establish a bank there where there is only poverty?

The honorable Senator said, if I remember aright, that when cotton was worth there but ten cents per pound they could not get money enough to move it and to buy it. I have no doubt it was true, and I believe that if the people there had any property to buy money with, if the doors should be opened so that men who have money could send it there and move the cotton, they would do it. But the object of the Senator was to show that they needed banking facilities and could offer inducements for them, and those inducements were grounded first upon poverty!

He said another thing, that the men who borrowed money there paid 1½ per cent. a month, and that compounded every thirty days made it perhaps equal to 24 per cent. a year. I ask how long a capitalist will loan his money at 24 per cent. per annum? I think it is perfectly clear that inasmuch as capital is shy, is timid, the Senator from Georgia would find it very difficult to win capital by such statements as he has made, so as to have it located for banking facilities in his State. I say this, regretting as I do that they have not greater means, because I believe it illustrates what they will find true if this bill shall pass, that their expectations will not be realized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] to strike out the third section of the bill and insert a substitute.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall vote against this amendment for several reasons.

First, I believe we have already too much currency in the country. There is too great a discrepancy between the amount of gold coin in the country and the volume of circulation. I believe it to be unwise and injudicious to increase that discrepancy; and for that reason, if there were no other, I should be compelled to vote against this amendment.

I am aware that the people of the South and West complain that they have not a fair proportion of the circulating medium in their midst; but when the proposition to-day was made to distribute $50,000,000 now engaged in banking capital in the East among the Southern and Western States, almost every friend of inflation from either of those sections recorded his vote against that distribution which they had heretofore claimed to be necessary and to be equitable. Therefore, if the failure of this measure in practice, if the increase of the circulating medium should still leave the West and the South destitute of banking capital, the responsibility must rest and ought to rest exclusively on the Senators from those sections of the country which have refused it and recorded their votes in opposition to it.

But, sir, I am opposed to this increase of the national banking circulation for another reason. It is a proposition to pension upon the Treasury of the United States $46,000,000 of additional capital. There are $400,000,000 of property of the rich men of the country now pensioned upon the Treasury of the United States, and those capitalists are drawing from the Treasury of the United States the interest of their capital. That Treasury is supplied by taxation upon the people of this country. The industries of the country are taxed and the benefit of that taxation conferred on the shareholders in the national banks; and this proposition is to increase the list of these pensioners upon the public Treasury. Against that I shall record my vote now, henceforth, and forever, whenever the proposition may come up.

But, sir, I shall vote against this whole bill. I shall vote against it whether this amendment is adopted or rejected, because the first provision of this bill now proposes to increase the legal-tender circulation of the United States. Sir, I believe there never was any power in Congress to make paper promises a legal tender. With that conviction resting upon my mind, notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in that regard, I cannot vote and no vote of mine shall ever be given to issue further paper money as legal tenders. Nothing but coin ought to be regarded as a legal tender in this country; and that paper legal tender which has been made by act of Congress is not to-day worth exceeding eighty-seven cents on the dollar. The people of this country are compelled as between themselves to accept it—to exchange their property for it at its face value. It is made a legal tender by law. If I owe a debt to you, sir, or to any one, it matters not when the debt was created or how honestly I may have promised to pay every dollar that I owe you, I can take this legal-tender currency and can tender it to you in payment of the debt and you are bound to receive it. The proposition in this bill to increase the volume of the legal-tender notes of this country, so that men can take advantage of it and pay their debts with a less amount than they ought to pay, shall never be carried out by any vote of mine. I therefore shall vote not only against the pending proposition, but against the bill, whether the amendment becomes a part of it or not.

Mr. MORTON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] to strike out the third section and insert the matter that has been read by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, Mr. DENNIS. If he were present he would undoubtedly vote for this amendment, and I should vote against it. And I take this occasion to say that on all these questions I am for the present paired with him.

Mr. FLANAGAN, (when his name was called.) I suppose that I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, Mr. BROWNLOW. I regret it very much. If he were present I should vote "nay," and he would vote "yea." I may make the same statement as to all other questions pertaining to this bill.

Mr. HAMLIN, (when the name of Mr. MORRILL of Maine, was called.) I wish to say on behalf of my colleague, who is absent, that he is paired with the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. SPRAGUE. If he were present he would vote "nay," and the Senator from Rhode Island "yea."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Delaware, Mr. BAYARD, and on all questions connected with this bill during the day. If he were present he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on this amendment.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 33, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sherman, Spencer, Thurman, Tipton, West, and Windom—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Jones, Kelly, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Stockton—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Flanagan, Gilbert, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Ransom, Schurz, Scott, Sprague, Stevenson, Wadleigh, and Wright—20.

So the amendment of Mr. MERRIMON was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the first section:

The surplus revenues of the Government shall be used for the purpose of accumulating coin in the Treasury, until the Secretary of the Treasury shall be enabled thereby to redeem United States notes in coin when presented; but this shall not prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from selling gold sufficient to meet all demands on the Treasury which are payable in currency over and above currency receipts, and to keep on hand a proper cash balance for that purpose, and to retire such notes as may be required by this act to be retired.

The Senate has voted to increase the greenbacks $44,000,000, and we have just voted for an increase of the national currency by $46,000,000. We have the paper circulation up to $800,000,000 of the two classes; and, as is suggested, the fractional currency is to be added. The proposition I submit is that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to retain the surplus revenue of the Government as a fund for the redemption of the greenbacks. It is the mildest proposition that can be put, if we mean to do anything to keep our pledges. We have heard it stated repeatedly in the Senate that the people of the country demand the increase of currency. Mr. President, the people were once tested. After the exigencies of the war were over appeals were made from various sources to induce the people to throw off the toilsome payment of what was termed an oppressive debt. Then the nation showed its true greatness, for the people all over the land, stalwart men with brawny arms and with the sweat-drops of labor on their brow, sent forth the decree that the faith and honor of the country should be inviolate; and they sent representatives here to carry out that decree, and those representatives placed upon the record, there to remain, if fulfilled, to the honor, and if repudiated to the dishonor, of this country forever, this sacred promise: "The United States solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin."

A proposition was made here, and is now renewed, to retain the accumulations of our surplus revenue in order to create a fund for the redemption of our promises, and we were told that the nation was too poor; that it was impossible to do anything. Sir, if we had shown the same want of resolution when the existence of this country was threatened we should to-day have had no nation to legislate about. When a proposition was made that those who held the notes of the United States should have the privilege of receiving an interest-bearing bond in exchange for them, we were seriously told that would cost five or ten million dollars a year; as if the fact that it cost something for a nation to pay its debts was a reason why it was not dishonored by the non-payment of its debts.

That is not all. We made a pledge that our interest-bearing obligations should not be paid before maturity unless the United States notes were at the time convertible into coin, unless they were paid off to secure a lower rate of interest. This was but equitable, and yet in violation of that pledge we have paid millions.

Mr. President, there is one other suggestion which I wish to make. There are Senators who have other obligations resting upon them than those which the Constitution imposes. Some here represent a political party, having come here avowing that we would carry out the sentiments of that party. On the 6th of June, 1872, at a convention held in Philadelphia, this plank of a platform was adopted:

We denounce the repudiation of the national debt, in any form or disguise, as a national crime, and confidently expect that our national currency will be perfected by a speedy resumption of specie payments.

And yet some of the representatives of that party have by their votes increased the paper promises of the country nearly $100,000,000 without making any provision for specie payments. No Senator questions that as we increase this volume of currency the feasibility of returning speedily to specie payments is diminished. Is this keeping faith?

Mr. President, this Government lies down on its promise; banks lie down on their promises; and it is no wonder that the atmosphere is filled with the sad stories of defalcations and violations of trust by clerks, and cashiers, and trustees, and comptrollers. The true keynote of integrity should here be set. When there is such a desolation of character, the nation should not break down the ramparts of the strictest integrity. If we refuse now to make this provision authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to hold the surplus revenue with the view at some future day of a resumption of specie payments, we take a departure that is in itself a dishonor.

Sir, I hope that the amendment may be adopted. I know the argument is used that the banks authorized will not be created, that the national currency will not be increased. We, however, legislate on the assumption that it will be; and I understand that the capitalists of the country might hesitate as to creating banks under the pledge of this Government that we were soon to return to specie payments; but the speculators of the country know that specie payments are out of the question, and every dollar that you will permit them to put in new banks will be speedily invested. Let this measure, feeble as it is, be adopted as some poor fulfillment of the repeated pledges which the Government and the dominant party have given.

Mr. THURMAN. I offer the following as an additional section to the bill——

Mr. CONKLING. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey to hold coin is now pending.

Mr. THURMAN. Let this lie on the table, then, until the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is disposed of.

Mr. MORTON. Let it be read for information.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That from and after June 30, 1874, one-twentieth of the customs duties shall be payable in United States legal-tender notes, and after June 30, 1875, one-tenth, and after June 30, 1876, one-fifth thereof may be so paid.

Mr. THURMAN. Now let the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the first section of the bill these words:

The surplus revenues of the Government shall be used for the purpose of accumulating coin in the Treasury until the Secretary of the Treasury shall be enabled thereby to redeem United States notes in coin when presented; but this shall not prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from selling gold sufficient to meet all demands on the Treasury which are payable in currency over and above currency receipts, and to keep on hand a proper cash balance for that purpose, and to retire such notes as may be required by this act to be retired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand the Senator from Ohio to move his amendment at present.

Mr. THURMAN. I have very great doubts of the wisdom of hoarding all the gold that will be received into the Treasury——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Ohio to move his amendment at present?

Mr. THURMAN. I understand I can move it as a substitute for the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be in order.

Mr. THURMAN. But I prefer to let the question be taken on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MORTON. Offer it as a substitute.

Mr. THURMAN. No; I do not want to complicate it. I desire to offer this as a distinct proposition before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator makes no motion, the Chair understands.

Mr. THURMAN. I make no motion at present. I shall offer my amendment after the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey has been voted upon.

Mr. LOGAN. Let us take a vote on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, and then you can offer your proposition.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say a word about the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

If I understand the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey it is that all the gold that shall be received into the Treasury—and I do not know but that it goes further than the gold—all the surplus revenue, whether it be in gold or in paper, shall be hoarded in the Treasury for the purpose of redeeming the legal-tender notes. I have very great doubts of the wisdom of that mode of redemption. What would it require? It would require that you should accumulate gold in the Treasury to the amount now of $400,000,000; that is, if this bill becomes a law, unless indeed it might be assumed that you could commence paying specie before you had acquired the full amount of $400,000,000 of gold; and I presume you could; but it would certainly require a very large accumulation of gold. As long as the banks are not paying specie, and as long as the volume of greenback currency is $400,000,000, it would not be safe for the Treasury to begin to pay gold until a very large accumulation had been made, such an accumulation as with a constant excess in the receipt of gold from the customs over and above the amount necessary to pay the interest on the public debt and our gold payments abroad to our ministers and to the Navy would secure a sum sufficient to pay the greenbacks as they might be presented. I do not know exactly what that would be. I do not therefore at first like very much the idea of hoarding the gold in this way, and unless better informed I cannot vote for the proposition of my friend from New Jersey, although it looks in the right direction.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the gold receipts of the country are $180,000,000.

Mr. MORTON. They were.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The gold expenditures are $136,000,000, leaving a difference of $44,000,000. It may be that it will be, and doubtless it would be, necessary to sell a part of that gold in order to meet the currency demands upon the Treasury, and yet it would be possible to retain a part of it, perhaps $20,000,000, perhaps more, and in the course of a few years we would have an accumulation of gold. The idea that we can ever keep our pledges and make these notes convertible without accumulating gold, I cannot comprehend. We can give paper for paper, but we cannot redeem our pledge and make the notes convertible into gold unless we have got the gold. This is a step in the right direction. It is a step that goes but a little way, I admit. There is no contraction in it; but it gives an assurance to the country that this Government does mean to keep its oft-repeated pledges.

Mr. THURMAN. One word more on this subject. How do merchants obtain gold now with which to pay duties? I suppose the largest portion of it is obtained by sales of bills of exchange, perhaps foreign bills drawn against parties in England or some merchandise or security sent to Europe and sold; but a large amount of the gold with which duties are paid is purchased in New York with greenbacks. Now, the effect of hoarding gold in the Treasury must necessarily, as it seems to me, be to increase the premium on gold and just to that extent to increase the customs duties. The idea, therefore, of hoarding two or three hundred millions of gold seems to me to involve the proposition to make the customs duties, which I think are already onerous, still more excessive.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, this was a favorite idea with me six years ago. I presented a proposition to this Senate about six years ago that the Government should retain the surplus gold in the Treasury to provide a fund with which to redeem the greenbacks. If we were to redeem the greenbacks in gold, I did not know any way to do it without getting the gold; and I did not know any way to get the gold except to save the surplus. But I was met almost unanimously by the Senate at that time with the objection that it would require us to hoard gold for several years; that that would make gold scarce in the market; that importers and persons who had to send gold abroad to pay interest would have to buy it at constantly increasing prices; and upon such arguments my proposition was rejected. There was much more gold in the country then than there is now, and that objection was less forcible then than it is now.

The proposition of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] that we shall receive a part of the duties in greenbacks looks in the other direction, looks to diminishing the receipts of gold in the Treasury. That Senator talks constantly about irredeemable paper and about the necessity of redeeming our notes in coin, and yet he proposes to diminish the supply of gold which the Government receives.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a modification to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey which I suggested, and which met his concurrence. It is manifest it ought to be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported as modified.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment as modified, as follows:

The surplus revenues of the Government shall be used for the purpose of accumulating coin in the Treasury until the Secretary of the Treasury shall be enabled thereby to redeem United States notes in coin when presented; but this shall not prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from selling gold sufficient to meet all demands on the Treasury which are payable in currency over and above currency receipts, and to keep on hand a proper cash balance for that purpose and to maintain the sinking fund.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see what possible objection there can be to this amendment. The great trouble, I am afraid, is that in the present condition of our revenue the surplus will not amount to anything. I doubt very much whether during the current year we shall be able to maintain the sinking fund. Indeed, the Secretary of the Treasury anticipates that he will not be able to provide for all the sinking fund this year. The statement laid upon our tables yesterday shows that since the 1st of July last our revenues have not been sufficient to pay our expenses, even without counting the sinking fund.

But the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey may be very useful in indicating a public policy. If it be adopted, the only thing in the bill (although I hope we may add something else to it before we get through) that will look to specie payments will be the accumulation of the surplus revenue. We have none now to accumulate; but in a year's time or in two years' time our revenues may so far improve that there may be a large accumulation of surplus revenue which will be applicable then to the purpose of maintaining and improving the credit of our currency rather than to the payment of the funded debt before it is due.

I shall therefore vote for the amendment. I do not see how gentlemen who are in favor of contraction can be opposed to an amendment to maintain a surplus revenue in the Treasury. For a year or two at least we cannot hope to have any; but as an indication of a public policy looking to the resumption of specie payments at some time it seems to me it is wise to insert it.

Now, as to the proposition of my colleague, for I may as well say what I have to say upon both questions at once, the objection I have to it is this: In the first place it is an express violation of section 5 of the act of February 5, 1862, which provides—

That all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin, or in notes payable on demand heretofore authorized to be issued and by law receivable in payment of public dues—

and the coin so paid shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows.

It is perfectly manifest, therefore, that we can only dispose of the surplus gold over and above the amount necessary to pay the interest on the public debt and to maintain the sinking fund; that is about one-fifth. My colleague recognizes the force of this obligation by limiting his amendment to one-fifth of the gold. But, on the other hand, what is the use of diminishing the revenues to the extent of the premium on that gold to the amount of one-fifth? My own impression is that it would create constant confusion and great trouble. At present the sub-treasury receives nothing but coin certificates or coin. The mere difference between the value of coin and currency for one-fifth of the amount of the duties would not be any considerable relief to the merchant, while it would be a very great practical embarrassment to the Treasury Department in maintaining two systems of coin and currency in the payment of duties. If a duty should amount to ten dollars, two dollars of it would be in currency and eight dollars of it in coin, making a complication of accounts.

But that is not all. It is practically a diminution of the revenue to the extent of the premium on the one-fifth; and at this time we certainly ought not to reduce the revenue. In any point of view, therefore, it seems to me the proposition of my colleague is not advisable. I therefore cannot vote for it. The proposition of the Senator from New Jersey I see no objection to, except, I am sorry to say, that we have not much revenue to accumulate at present.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, to the fact which he has stated in his reference to the statute which he has read. At that time Congress provided for the payment for duties of the old demand notes, similar to the proposition now made by his colleague.

Mr. SHERMAN. They have all been paid off.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. But at that time they were not paid off, and the law provided that they should be received for duties, which is precisely the proposition made by the Senator's colleague.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was a mere provision that we should not dishonor them. Those $50,000,000 of demand notes were issued receivable for customs expressly, and consequently we could not pass a law that would violate the performance of that obligation.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Still they were in existence, and the law provided for their use.

Now, as regards the other point that the Senator made, does it not appreciate the greenbacks by permitting a portion of them to be paid for duties? Does not that run in the line of the policy advocated by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, and does it not also check the competition in the market for gold by reducing the amount necessary to be used for customs dues?

Mr. SHERMAN. In reply to the Senator, I stated the other day that this proposition would tend in one direction to appreciate the value of greenbacks, by making them useful for a purpose for which they cannot now be used; but at the same time it would diminish our revenue to the extent of the premium on the gold. It would make a very great difficulty in the accounts and the dealings between merchants and the Treasury and create great embarrassment to trade; and it would open up a question here on the floor of the Senate at this late day of the diminution of the duties on imported goods, because to the precise extent that you receive these notes in payment of customs duties you diminish the duties on imported goods. It will raise that question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have but a word to say. The suggestions against this amendment from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and from the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] do not correspond, do not harmonize. My friend from Ohio, while he will vote for it, thinks there is not much efficiency in the amendment because we shall have no surplus, while my friend from Indiana fears that the great accumulation this amendment provides for of gold in the Treasury will prevent the merchants from obtaining the necessary gold and embarrass business.

As to the first suggestion, that there is no surplus, it seems to me the Committee on Finance ought to address themselves to that question very vigorously. An increase of the tax on whisky and tobacco, as I indicated some three or four weeks ago, would give us a very material increase of our revenue, and we should then have a surplus.

As to the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana that this accumulation would interfere with business, I believe if this Government had an accumulation of gold it could control the gold market instead of being controlled by it, and there would be no difficulty on the double security of our own bonds in issuing gold certificates so as to relieve the demand for gold, and thus even prevent this amount of gold lying without producing any interest. The great advantage of this plan over any other is simply this: We say that the national banks may redeem in greenbacks; now we must make those greenbacks equivalent to gold; and if we do, we save all the interest that the funding of $400,000,000 would require, while at the same time we fulfill our pledge in making them convertible into coin.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I regret that the Senator from Indiana feels obliged to go against any proposition that he was in favor of six years ago. I do not regard this proposition as likely to have any effect for the coming year. Unquestionably we shall have a deficiency and shall be unable to supply the entire amount required for the sinking fund, and it may be, and probably will be, the duty of Congress before its adjournment to provide for that deficiency in some way.

As it has been the practice to consider both of these amendments at the same time, the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey and the amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio, I desire to say a single word upon the proposition made by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and that is that it is an indirect way of reducing the present tariff. At a moment when our revenues are less than are required for our ordinary expenditures, the Senator from Ohio proposes to decrease them. I think that is a sufficient answer to the proposition made by the Senator from Ohio, for it would practically operate as a diminution of the tariff upon all articles to the extent of the premium on the part of the duty that is proposed to be paid in paper.

Mr. MORTON. There will be nothing for this amendment of the Senator from New Jersey to operate on this year, and probably not for several years, certainly not until there is a restoration of good times. The Senator from Vermont refers to what I proposed six years ago. If my recollection is correct, when I made this proposition six years ago my friend from Vermont was on the other side.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I cannot say.

Mr. MORTON. I rather think he was.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I would prefer to have the Senator produce the record.

Mr. MORTON. I have not time to hunt it up, and I do not think Senators' records are worth the labor sometimes. [Laughter.] I would want to know that the record was valuable before taking the trouble to hunt it up.

One thing further. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to the fact that his amendment leaves it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury when he will begin to redeem. He may begin when he gets $25,000,000, when he gets $50,000,000, or when he gets $60,000,000. It leaves it altogether discretionary with him. That is a very great power, a very great discretion.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The amendment says nothing about redemption—when he shall begin. The bill that I introduced before did.

Mr. MORTON. That is where this is defective.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; that left it discretionary. If that is the objection that you make here, this only provides for the accumulation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey has exhausted his ten minutes.

Mr. THURMAN. I move to strike out these words at the close of the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, "and to maintain the sinking fund." They ought to be stricken out, although that is not particularly my reason for moving to strike out, because they provide that the Secretary of the Treasury may sell gold to maintain the sinking fund. The sinking fund is to be in gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. No.

Mr. THURMAN. The greater part of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. O, no; he sells all the gold.

Mr. THURMAN. In bonds?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. The duties are pledged to the sinking fund.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir; and to be paid in gold.

Mr. MORTON. That is a part of the contract.

Mr. THURMAN. That is provided for in the act of 1862; but I do not care about that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that these words were inserted at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, supposing that they were necessary in order to preserve the law.

Mr. THURMAN. If Senators say so, very well; I will withdraw that motion and move another amendment.

What the Senator from Indiana says is perfectly true, that this amendment fixes no time when redemption shall commence. It would seem to leave it entirely within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. The accumulation is to go on "until the Secretary of the Treasury shall be enabled thereby to redeem United States notes in coin when presented." I suppose that intends to leave him to judge whether he can commence with coin equal to 25 per cent., or 30 per cent., or 40 per cent., or 50 per cent. of the outstanding volume of greenbacks. I do not know that it is very wise to vest in a single officer of the Government the discretion to determine when specie payments shall be resumed in this country; a resumption that must affect more or less the business of the entire country, and which will require, whenever it takes place on the greenbacks, that the nineteen hundred and odd national banks and the new banks that are to be created shall all pay specie too. I think that is too much power to vest in any one man, and therefore there ought to be some amendment here, if this proposition is to be adopted, saying that the redemption shall commence when the accumulation bears a certain proportion to the outstanding volume of the greenbacks. That seems to me to be necessary; and, in order that the sense of the Senate may be tested on that, I move to insert after the word "presented" the words "which redemption shall commence when the accumulated gold is equal to 75 per cent. of the amount of outstanding greenbacks." I am not particular about 75 per cent. I do not think it would be necessary to go so high as that, but I move that simply as an amendment to test the sense of the Senate. I think myself we might commence redemption with 50 per cent., perhaps.

Mr. LOGAN. We might commence it, but it would not last long.

Mr. THURMAN. We might commence it and it would last, too, provided the receipts from customs should continue to be what they have been for the last five or six years. So much for that. I am not, however, in favor of this proposition for the reasons I have stated already and which I do not wish to repeat.

Now, I wish to say a word or two upon the proposition which I intend to submit, and which is not yet before the Senate, but has been commented upon.

In the first place, it is said by the Senator from Indiana that that is a step in the opposite direction. I do not know what he means by a step in the opposite direction.

Mr. MORTON. No; I did not say that. I saw the Senator from Ohio had been talking about irredeemable paper and the importance of redeeming it in coin, and at the same time he proposes to diminish the receipts of coin by the Government.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not care whether the Government has the coin or whether the people have the coin, so that the coin is in the country. It is not in any wise a step toward irredeemable paper to say that a certain proportion of the customs duties shall be payable in greenbacks, but it is a direct step toward resumption.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to my friend on the question of redeeming greenbacks that it is the Government that has to redeem them and not the people, and therefore it is very material whether the people have the gold, or the Government.

Mr. THURMAN. I will show how it is a direct step in favor of resumption. It is admitted on all hands that if you receive a portion of the customs duties in greenbacks you will appreciate the value of the greenbacks. Everybody admits that, for everybody must see it. Well, just precisely as you bring greenbacks up to the standard of gold, just so do you make it perfectly easy for the Government to resume specie payments. When greenbacks shall have arrived at a commercial par with gold the Government could resume specie payments on their greenbacks with $10,000,000 of coin in the Treasury, for there would be no run upon it for the coin. Therefore every measure which tends to bring greenbacks up to the standard of gold is a measure that tends to enable the Government to redeem them in gold, and brings about a resumption of specie payments without any pressure, without any hardship. That is the merit of the proposition, that without any shock at all, without any contraction, without any hardship you gradually appreciate the value of greenbacks and bring them up to gold, and then the Government can resume specie payments without any danger whatever of having to suspend the next day.

But it is said by my colleague that this would be a violation of the act of 1862. By no manner of means is it a violation of that act. What is the provision of that act?

That all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin, or in notes payable on demand heretofore authorized to be issued.

They were coin notes; they are out of existence now, and so I may read it simply that all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin.

And the coin so paid shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

That is the first thing; and so far as this act is a pledge, that is a pledge to the holders of the securities of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

There are two objects. You may say the gold is applied to those two objects: first, to pay the interest on the public debt, which is payable in gold; and second, to provide a sinking fund. Is there any further pledge? None whatever. The third clause is:

The residue thereof to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

What is the meaning of that? It is to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and then capable of being appropriated precisely as Congress shall see fit. There is no limitation whatever upon it; and what has Congress done? Has not Congress allowed the Secretary of the Treasury to sell this gold by the hundred millions since this act of 1862 was passed? And who pretends that his sale of the gold for greenbacks was a violation of the pledge contained in that act? If his sale of gold for greenbacks was not a violation of that pledge, then the receipt of a certain proportion of greenbacks in payment of customs duties is no violation of that pledge. All the Government creditor has a right to is that he shall have his interest in gold and that he shall have a certain sinking fund set apart. That is the sole pledge that has been made to him; and with the residue of gold we can do what the public interest requires. There is no violation, then, of the pledge of the Government.

But in the next place it is said that this measure will give rise to practical difficulties. I can conceive of no practical difficulty in it that amounts to anything. I propose at first that one-twentieth of the duties shall be received in greenbacks—that is a sum easily calculated—and then one-tenth, and then one-fifth. It would not take a boy ten years old to make the calculations upon any invoice as to what duties were to be paid. There can be no trouble about that. If our customs officers are not able to make such calculations and receive payment, they ought to be turned out and better men put in their places.

But then it is said it is proposed to decrease the revenue. How? My friend from Vermont talks about its decreasing the revenue, and my colleague talks about its decreasing the revenue. How? Because you will not take the whole of the customs duties in gold, and let the Government shave its own notes by selling gold for greenbacks and getting for one dollar in gold one dollar and ten cents or one dollar and thirteen cents in greenbacks. That is a singular argument to come from my friends who want gold and greenbacks to be on a par, or want greenbacks abolished altogether. Do they want this spectacle to go on of the Government collecting revenue to carry on the business of the Government by collecting gold, and then buying its own notes at a discount to pay the ordinary expenses? They talk about the Government being dishonored by the fact that these notes are unpaid promises to pay, and yet they propose that the Government shall go on collecting gold and then buying in its own paper at a discount of 10, 15, or 20 per cent. That is not the way I wish to see this Government carry on its business.

Sir, there is nothing in this fear of depreciating or diminishing the revenue to frighten us at all. Here is a plain proposition. The ultimate extent to which I have gone is seven-twentieth parts of the revenue, about one-third of the revenue. Can you safely collect one-third of your revenue after 1876 in legal-tender notes? According to all our experience you can do it, and have ample coin left to pay all the interest on the public debt and to provide for the sinking fund. Why, then, should we not do it? Why, then, should we not in this gradual way bring greenbacks up to gold and by doing so enable the Government to commence redemption, and with it bring redemption throughout the whole country?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I desire to remind the Senator just there of one thing in the line of what he has been saying. He has cited the law and the pledge of the Government in regard to the disposition of the coin received through duties. I wish to remind him that the sinking fund, which was one of the pledges made at that time, was not created until March, 1869.

Mr. SHERMAN. The sinking fund was created by this very same section of the act of 1862.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The law providing for the sinking fund was passed by the act of 1862, but the sinking fund itself, by the appropriation of gold for it, was not commenced until 1869.

Mr. SHERMAN. O, yes; it was provided for, but it was only modified.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It was provided for by law, but not carried out in fact until 1869.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not care whether it was or not. There is the law, and I am willing to stand on the law and treat that as the pledge of the Government to the bondholders if they want that pledge. I am willing to stand by the faith of the Government. All I ask is that after we have performed all we have promised to do for them, then we shall do something for the people.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It was not until the administration of President Grant and Secretary BOUTWELL, of the Treasury, in 1869, that the sinking fund was provided for in fact, by the appropriation of gold to it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I rise to make an inquiry. Is the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] pending before the body?

Mr. THURMAN. No; not now.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Then why discuss it? As I understand, the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] is now pending. Let us take a vote upon that first, and then we can come to this other question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moved an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey, which is now pending.

Mr. THURMAN. No; I withdraw that. That was in regard to the amount of gold that must be accumulated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio withdraws his amendment. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, I do not understand that this amendment gives the Secretary of the Treasury any additional power in reference to redemption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey has exhausted his time. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I call for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Conkling, Cragin, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Kelly, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Sherman, Stewart, and Wadleigh—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Spencer, Thurman, Tipton, and West—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Chandler, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hager, Hitchcock, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Windom, and Wright—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THURMAN. I now offer my amendment as an additional section:

That from and after June 30, 1874, one-twentieth of the customs duties shall be payable in United States legal-tender notes, and after June 30, 1875, one-tenth, and after June 30, 1876, one-fifth thereof may be so paid.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The measures before Congress are ostensibly to increase the business of the country by giving larger accommodations in the way of paper money. Now the proposition of the Senator from Ohio is simply to cripple manufactures by reducing the tariff on imports to the extent of the depreciation of our paper money so far as any portion of it is used under his proposed amendment in the payment of duties. Besides that, it proposes a measure that changes the tariff every day. Whenever the price of gold shall be higher or lower, the tariff will be changed accordingly; so that we shall have a fixed tariff, and yet one that is extremely flexible.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Ohio by adding the following:

Whenever the same can be done without violating the pledge made by the act of February 25, 1862, for the payment of the interest on the public debt and providing for the sinking fund.

Mr. THURMAN. I am willing to accept that. I do not think it is necessary, but some Senators think it is, and out of abundant caution I am willing to accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio accepts the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BOGY. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio as modified. I will read my amendment for information. It is to change the amount to be received in the way provided as follows: That "after June 30, 1874, one-fourth of the customs duties shall be received in legal-tender notes and national-bank notes, and after the 1st of January next, one-half shall be received in such notes." My amendment proposes to accomplish the same object as that of the Senator from Ohio, except that the proportions are larger; and instead of providing that legal-tender notes only shall be received, I wish to extend it to national-bank notes. I desire to occupy a very few minutes in explanation of the amendment which I propose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will first be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment so that it will read:

That from and after June 30, 1874, one-fourth of the customs duties shall be payable in legal-tender notes or national-bank notes, and from and after the 1st of January, 1875, one-half shall be payable in such notes.

Mr. BOGY. I wish to modify my own amendment, although that is the proposition which I presented some time ago. I will modify it so as to confine the receipt to legal-tender notes, excluding national-bank notes, and I will give the reasons for that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported as modified.

Mr. THURMAN. Allow me to call the Senator's attention to one fact. His amendment if adopted would defeat the whole thing, because it would make it impossible to comply with the act of 1862 unless our customs duties were increased very largely. Let me give the Senator the figures. It requires now to pay the interest on the public debt and to provide for the sinking fund, and to pay for our expenses abroad——

Mr. BOGY. If the Senator will excuse me, I will relieve him by telling him that I am aware of all these things, and I will give the reasons for this amendment in anticipation of the very objections that he rises to make.

Mr. THURMAN. Let me say that the amount required in gold is $136,000,000, and we receive something over $180,000,000 a year, which leaves us only about $44,000,000.

Mr. BOGY. The limited time accorded me will not allow me to show that the calculation presented by the Senator from Ohio or by his colleague is incorrect. I will simply say that our gold receipts amount to about $180,000,000 or $190,000,000 a year, and we need for the public debt about $100,000,000. We need for the sinking fund, gentlemen say, $30,000,000. Well, then, we have a gold surplus of $50,000,000. But we can so arrange that not one cent of gold need be used for the sinking fund. I have not the time to go into that; but it can be shown that gold is not necessary to comply with that portion of the contract.

But, sir, I desire to come to the act of 1862 upon which all these arguments have been based that it would be a breach of public faith now to receive in payment of customs duties legal-tender notes instead of gold. I have looked carefully into that act and I have listened with great attention to the arguments which have been made on this floor by the chairman of the Committee on Finance as well as by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from New Jersey and other Senators, and I have yet to see the force of their arguments.

The law of 1862 provides that customs duties shall be paid in gold, and be appropriated first to the payment of the interest on the public debt; second, to the sinking fund; and third, the balance to go into the Treasury as any other fund might go, subject to the disposal of the Congress of the United States. The object of that pledge at that time was, doubtless, to give character and credit to our bonds. We were then engaged in war. The amount of bonds we then had outstanding was small; but if the war continued, as a matter of course there would become a necessity for this nation to extend its debt to a very large amount. It was thence wise, and I commend the wisdom of it, to strengthen the public credit by a measure of this kind; but I say there was no pledge made, no contract made beyond this, that the bonds of the United States and the interest on those bonds should be payable in gold. That was the essence of the contract. The fact that gold was so used, no doubt, did the credit of the nation good at that time, but that did not enter into the contract. The contract is that the bonds shall be at maturity payable in gold. I doubt myself whether it was even a contract at that day, and indeed I believe it was not a contract; but I yield that point because by the act of 1869 it was said to be a contract; but granting that it was a contract, the essence of the contract was that we should pay this debt in gold.

It is proper for a nation having but little credit, like an individual having little credit, to give security for loans. A nation like Mexico or Venezuela or any other nation that has not much credit before the world has to pledge its customs receipts to enable it to negotiate a loan at all. But I say this nation has passed that period; its public faith is good enough; and yet for the purpose of raising $100,000,000, or $120,000,000, or $130,000,000 a year in gold, by the argument made on this floor by every gentleman who has spoken on the subject, the currency has been depreciated 10 per cent. Your legal currency being depreciated 10 per cent., there is an actual loss between it and gold of $40,000,000 a year. As a matter of interest it will be a great deal better for us to receive all our customs duties in paper money and periodically to buy gold for the purposes for which the Government requires gold, because if you received your customs duties in paper money the difference between gold and paper money would be small, and as you would need but $100,000,000 of gold to pay your interest, you might well afford to pay 10, 15, or 20 per cent. for your gold and yet make money by the transaction. The depreciation is on the broad basis of $400,000,000 now of legal-tender notes, and at 10 per cent. it is $40,000,000. It would be better for this nation, on the score of mere dollars and cents, to buy the gold it needs.

If it were possible that this could be considered a breach of contract before the eyes of the world, of course I would not advocate it; but concede for the sake of the argument that these bonds were made payable in gold, then that is the essence of the contract, and the mode and manner in which this nation shall raise the money to do that is not a part of the contract. Nor would it affect the credit of this nation at all even to the hundredth part of a cent. There is not a bondholder in Europe or in the world but has the utmost confidence in the ability and willingness of this nation to pay all its obligations in the manner it undertook to pay them, whether in gold or greenbacks.

The only good argument which I have heard, and I think the only view in opposition to this amendment which is entertained by a large number of Senators on this floor, is the one advanced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] awhile ago in answer to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] that by the receipt of paper money in payment of duties you would decrease your tariff duties. That is really the effect.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to call his attention to one point. I do not want to make a speech on any of these questions, but I want to call his attention to one point which he may have overlooked, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Ohio also to it. This amendment although offered in good faith, as all these amendments are, would if put on this bill be its certain defeat. Why? Under the Constitution the House of Representatives alone can originate a bill for the raising of revenues; and under that provision of the Constitution the construction has been that any measure changing, raising, or diminishing the revenue in any degree, no matter how slight, must originate in the other House. So the very moment this is put on this bill the House of Representatives, as they did two years ago in another case, would stop the proposition. I ask, then, the friends of the measure not to allow any such thing as this to go on the bill, which if done here will be done in my opinion in violation of the Constitution, and I could not vote for the bill with it in.

Mr. BOGY. I regret that I disagree with my distinguished friend from Illinois——

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wanted to call the Senator's attention to that point, thinking that he had overlooked it.

Mr. BOGY. I regret that I disagree with my distinguished friend under whose banner I have been walking, and walking to victory, the last four or five days. I do not think there is anything in the objection which he raises. This does not affect the revenue in the way contemplated by the Constitution, surely. The mode of collecting the revenue cannot be construed to come within the provision of the Constitution on that subject.

Mr. President, I think it is very manifest to the mind of every Senator on this floor that there is a majority of this body—and I use the word with some hesitation, because I do not like to use it in a body of this character; but to express my idea I am compelled to do it—that there is a majority in this House in favor of an expansion of the paper money of the nation. For reasons which I have given heretofore, disapproving as I do of the entire system, I am in favor of an augmentation, which some call expansion, and I have so signified my position. It being to me a fact apparent that cannot be contradicted that there will be an augmentation or expansion of the currency, it becomes of the greatest importance, and I realize the importance myself, that proper securities shall be given to prevent that enlarged circulation from being depreciated. If you make it too large and depreciate it itself by the very law you pass, of course it will have that effect.

Now, the great reason, the paramount reason, why the legal-tenders are not to-day equal to gold in value is owing to the fact that we ourselves by an act of Congress depreciate our own issue. Let the Congress of the United States that creates this money say that it shall be good money for all the dues of the Government without any exception; and as far as I am concerned I would go further. I say it would be wise and proper to make no discrimination between legal-tenders and national-bank notes; but knowing the views of a number of Senators on this floor, with some of whom I have agreed in the votes in regard to expansion, that the legal-tender is used as a means of redemption of national-bank notes, I yield my convictions in that respect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has spoken ten minutes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I know very well that my opinion in relation to this subject will not be very welcome to those who are sustaining this bill; but at the same time I feel it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to one or two points in this measure.

The proposition is here that we shall take a portion of our duties in paper instead of gold. What will be the practical effect in the first instance? Merely to make perhaps twenty or thirty million dollars of gold an article of merchandise, and have it exported from the country. Do those here who advocate an expansion of currency feel any particular hostility, after they have got all the paper they require, to having thirty or forty or fifty millions more of specie in the country? Not one dollar more will be purchased for the purpose of paying duties.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will notice that the proposition is not offered by any person who has advocated an increase of the currency. It is offered by the Senator from Ohio, who is opposed to an increase of the currency.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I stand corrected. Now, Mr. President, there will be no more gold purchased for the purpose of paying duties, whether the amount of duties is all paid in coin or not, with the bare exception of this proposed reduction, and if this proposed reduction of the amount to be paid in coin shall take place, as I said, it will merely give the privilege to the country of exporting that amount, and there will be so much less of gold remaining in the country afterward than there is now.

Can gentlemen suppose that our paper currency is going to be increased in value by the amount of diminution of the coin of the country? The very idea is an absurdity. Of course all recognize or have hitherto recognized the fact, that if we had a sufficient amount of gold it would be in the power of the Government to commence a resumption of specie payments. But this proposition goes in the direction of transacting the entire business of the country on paper, and bidding farewell to the idea of ever resuming specie payments, and that without the slightest reason, except the reason that may be offered by those who are in favor of reducing our present tariff on duties. If there are any here who are in favor of diminishing the receipts of the Treasury, they may be in favor of going for this measure; but I think no one who has any interest or any responsibility for this Administration can propose at the present time or vote for a proposition that will diminish the revenues, which are now notoriously insufficient to pay the ordinary expenses and provide a sinking fund.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to call attention a little more distinctly to the point made by the Senator from Illinois in reference to this amendment. It certainly will have the effect of tabling this bill in the House of Representatives if this amendment be voted into it, and for this reason: it will be practically a reduction of the customs duties. If it were to go into effect to-day, it would be a reduction of 12 per cent. on the amount of the duties authorized to be paid in paper currency. There can be no doubt about that.

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator allow me one word?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. BOGY. I contend that that difference will disappear at once when we increase the value of the greenback by this process.

Mr. SCOTT. Let that be as it may in the future, I am looking at it as a practical question in the light in which it will be viewed by the House of Representatives. It is not an open question as to how they will receive legislation of this character. We passed a few sessions ago a bill in this body to repeal the income tax. That was a bill reducing taxation, abolishing taxation, a bill that did not put money in the Treasury at all, did not raise revenue; and yet when it went to the House of Representatives they held that as it affected the revenue it was a measure which the Senate could not originate, and therefore they refused to consider it; they laid it upon the table; and so pertinacious were they upon that subject that they insisted upon it and demanded a committee of conference between the two Houses for the purpose of settling the question. The same question has occurred several times on minor subjects in relation to bills that had been amended by the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Once this session.

Mr. SCOTT. And once this session upon a very small point, on which probably the question will come up again. I call attention to it simply as a practical question. Is it advisable that on a bill of this character, upon which the country is asking for speedy action, where both Houses are desirous of speedy action, we should with our eyes open, whatever view we may entertain of the position assumed by the House, incorporate in the bill a provision which will have the effect of putting it upon the table in that House and clogging its passage? I shall certainly vote against the amendment, if for no other reason for that reason, although I concur in the views that have been expressed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, before I say anything upon this subject I wish to observe that upon reflection I am inclined to think that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa, and which without due consideration I accepted, had better be withdrawn. There are some Senators who think that it would lead to uncertainty as to whether these legal-tenders would or would not be receivable at any given time in payment of customs duties—an uncertainty that ought not to exist for a single moment. I hope, therefore, that the Senator from Iowa will agree that that may be withdrawn at least for the present.

Mr. WRIGHT. I appreciate what has been said by the Senator from Ohio touching the amendment that I offered. I can see very well that it may leave this question in such doubt and uncertainty that perhaps, instead of reaching the end that is desired by him and the friends of the measure, it may have the effect of crippling it and leaving the matter in such an uncertain position that it is better to have the vote taken upon his proposition by itself, before any further amendment shall be offered. I therefore withdraw my amendment, and leave the question as first presented by him.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to reply now to an objection that is started against this proposition of mine even by some Senators who do not profess hostility to it, and that is that it must necessarily destroy the bill, because the House of Representatives will not pass any bill which contains any measure originating in the Senate which affects the public revenue. Well, sir, if that is the Constitution of this country, the sooner the Government is abolished and another government set up the better it will be for the people. But that is not the law. My friend from Pennsylvania certainly does not believe that is the Constitution.

Mr. SCOTT. My friend from Ohio will permit me to say that I took the trouble to write a somewhat lengthy report on that subject, in which I took the ground that the House of Representatives was entirely wrong in its position on that question. But, nevertheless, that does not remove their objection as a practical question of legislation.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator did write that report, which does him infinite credit as a constitutional lawyer; and I think there was not a member of the Senate who did not agree with it, and I do not suppose the Senate intends to relinquish or abjure its constitutional rights. Nor does it follow because a House of Representatives of a former Congress entertained very erroneous notions on the subject of the rights of the Senate, that therefore the present House does; or, if the present House does, that therefore we should abnegate our powers and be governed by the opinion of the House. But, sir, there is nothing in this idea whatsoever. A bill to raise taxes must originate in the House of Representatives. The Constitution is clear enough on that subject; but does it say that every bill or measure that in anywise affects the revenue of the country must have its origin there? It says nothing of the sort. If that were the case we could not originate a bill here in regard to the public lands, or we could not amend a bill in regard to what should be receivable in payment for the public lands. A host of bills would be wholly unconstitutional if they originated in the Senate, because they increase the revenue from the public lands. An amendment to allow homestead, or pre-emption, of payment in scrip, or anything of that kind, if moved in the Senate, would be unconstitutional, because it would affect the revenue. Nay, sir, every single grant to railroads that has been made by bills originating in the Senate would also be unconstitutional, because they tended to diminish the revenue. So that idea does not stand at all. What is the provision of the Constitution, pray? That all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to state what I meant by raising the objection? I did not propose to discuss the constitutionality of this question, but merely to suggest to the Senate that the question would be raised in the House, and that, knowing what the House had determined, it was a matter for us to look at carefully here in the Senate before we send such a bill there. I agreed with the Senate when the House dissented before and when the conference was had which has been referred to; but knowing the facts, I say according to the theory of the House (whether correct or not is not the question) this amendment upon the bill would subject it to their objection, beyond all doubt, in my judgment. Therefore I said what I did, that it would certainly produce the defeat of the bill either here or in the House.

Mr. CONKLING. As the Senator from Ohio is interrupted for a moment, will he let me make a suggestion? I hope no Senator will accept the idea that this presents a question parallel to that in respect of which the Senator from Pennsylvania made a report. The suggestion now made goes as far as this: if we were to undertake to say by a bill originating here that in future silver would not be a legal tender for any purpose in sums greater than ten dollars, that would encounter this objection. Why? Because it would require the payment of duties in silver, just as this does when you say that hereafter gold may not be tendered for all the duties, but a certain portion of them may be paid in greenbacks. I venture to say it has nothing whatever to do with the question which the Senator from Pennsylvania discussed in the report to which reference has been made.

Mr. THURMAN. What is said by the Senator from New York is precisely true. It is a wholly different thing from that. I can demonstrate that this whole bill runs counter to the idea of the House of Representatives if this amendment of mine does, for this bill affects the revenue without my amendment at all. It affects the value of the medium in which the taxes shall be paid and its purchasing power in the hands of the Government; and upon the same kind of reasoning by which this amendment of mine would be held to be a measure for raising revenue, which therefore must originate in the House of Representatives, this whole bill would have to originate there; in other words, the Senate would be shorn of its power to legislate as the Constitution provides it shall. I will not waste any time on that. I am sorry that those who are opposed to this measure interpose such an obstacle as that to frighten us out of our propriety.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me a word, as I raised the question. The Senator says he is sorry those opposed to it do so. I am not opposed to his proposition. The Senator mistakes me. In a speech here on the 19th day of January I suggested to the chairman of the Finance Committee to let a portion of the duty be payable in greenbacks. I raised the objection to putting it on this bill because I believed it would affect the passage of the bill; and that is my objection to it, and not to the principle, by any means.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not misunderstand the Senator from Illinois. I did not believe he was hostile to the amendment I offered. I was not alluding to him as being hostile to it, for in principle I understand him to be in favor of it. But let that pass.

Now it is said by the Senator from Vermont that this proposition of mine is a proposition tending toward perpetuating an irredeemable currency. Well, upon my word, that is quite past my comprehension. Can any man doubt for one moment that if you say that a portion of the revenue now payable in gold only may be paid in the legal-tenders of the United States, that makes those notes more valuable than they now are; that that approximates them to gold? Is there anybody who can doubt that proposition? Has it not been said by the Committee on Finance, did not the distinguished Senator from Vermont as one of the members of that committee report the second section of this bill providing for the redemption of these notes in 5 per cent. bonds, upon the very ground that 5 per cent. bonds being at par with gold, if you made the greenbacks convertible into them you would bring the greenbacks up to the par of gold; and now when it is proposed to make the greenbacks equal to gold in the payment of customs duties, it is said that will not have the effect of appreciating them at all; that will not raise their value at all; but on the contrary it is a step toward perpetuating an irredeemable currency. Sir, I cannot understand such a proposition as that; and I cannot help thinking that if my respected friend, the Senator from Vermont—and there is no man who respects his intellect and his purity more than I do—were not a little warped in his judgment on this question by that prodigious affection he has for a high protective tariff, which amounts almost to the fanaticism of a first love, he would not see this measure in the light he does. But it is before the Senate, and there is no use in arguing it. The Senate understands the proposition. I propose, without any shock, without any contraction, without any violence to the business of the country, without injuring any man who owes money, and without raising any conflict between the debtor and creditor class, a measure that is in the direction of a return to a sound specie-paying currency—not so rapidly as to shock business or do injury to any debtor in the whole country, but quiet and easy in its application, and certain in its effects. I do not say that there may not be much better propositions; but I do say to those who are opposed, as I am opposed, to an irredeemable paper currency now and forever, that I believe they had better take this proposition which I believe they can carry, and enact it into a law.

Mr. CARPENTER. I desire to explain why I shall vote against this proposition. I am for it in and of itself, and on an independent bill introduced providing what the amendment of the Senator from Ohio provides I would vote for it. I am in the second place perfectly clear in my mind that the objection which the House will take to this proposition has no foundation whatever, that a bill to raise revenue within the meaning of the Constitution must be a bill under and by virtue of which revenue is collected. That is the only kind of a bill which can be styled a bill raising revenue; but it is equally clear in my opinion that the House will object to this, and lay the whole bill upon the table if we send it there. I shall therefore, and for only that reason, vote against this amendment.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It is hardly necessary for me to repeat here that I am in favor of the proposition proposed by the Senator from Ohio. As early as the 4th of December, in a speech which I had the honor to submit to the Senate, I declared my belief that if the Government would make its currency uniform and a full legal tender, it would appreciate it, as the currency of France to-day is appreciated, but within ¼ per cent. of coin. The currency of France is receivable for customs, and if our currency was receivable for customs also we should find no perceptible difference worth noticing between our currency and coin. I also reiterated that view in a speech made, I think, on the 10th of March, and I am of the same opinion now. I am willing, however, to defer to the judgment of others who think that the House of Representatives would lay this bill on the table because holding the feature proposed to be placed in it by the Senator from Ohio, and it is only on that account that I rise to occupy any of the time of the Senate, because I made up my mind at the opening of this day that I would say nothing, if possible, that we might come to a vote and conclude this subject; and yet I am now forced to place myself right on this question, and to say, as has been said by our President pro tempore, that whenever there is an opportunity, divested of the difficulties which seem to be attached now to the question, I shall be most happy to vote for a proposition of this kind, believing that it is in the line of the appreciation of the currency, and is the best way of placing our currency at par with coin. I shall be compelled to vote against it at the present time as an amendment to this bill, however, for the reason already stated.

Mr. WRIGHT. Having paired with the Senator from Vermont, Mr. EDMUNDS, upon all questions in connection with this bill, inasmuch as it will be my duty to state that fact when the vote shall be taken, I embrace this opportunity to state the reasons why I should vote for this proposition if at liberty to vote.

During the first week of January, soon after the recess, it will be remembered that in some remarks which I had the honor to submit to the Senate I stated that I believed 10 per cent. of the customs revenues could be safely collected in greenbacks, and that in my judgment there was not any step that could be taken which would tend more certainly to the appreciation of the greenbacks than that one step. I believe so yet; and whether it shall be 10 per cent. or the per cent. proposed by the Senator from Missouri, would make but little difference so far as the principle is concerned. So far as the question now before the Senate is concerned and its effect on this particular bill, as to what steps the House might take on that question is a matter for each Senator to determine for himself. Inasmuch as I am precluded from voting on the question, I only deemed it my duty to state at this time, that I may place myself right, that if allowed to vote I should vote for this proposition.

Mr. MORTON. I desire simply to state the reason for my vote. I shall not vote upon this proposition on its merits. I think the objection is well taken that it belongs to a class of measures which must originate in the House of Representatives. All laws for raising revenue must originate in the House of Representatives. It is equally a part of that prerogative to determine in what the revenue shall be received, because the medium in which it is to be received may affect the amount. For that reason, whether it is to be received in paper or in coin, as that may affect the actual amount of the revenue, is a question to originate in the House—not to be finally determined there, but to originate there; and for that reason, without giving any opinion on the proposition made by the Senator from Ohio or my friend from Missouri, I shall vote "nay."

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from Ohio for the very reasons assigned by Senators on the other side for voting against it. If I can be induced to believe that putting this proposition in this bill will induce the House to lay it on the table, that is what I want; and the sooner it goes on the table the better, as it now stands. I shall therefore vote for that proposition of the Senator from Ohio. I am for collecting the revenues of the United States in gold and silver; and I am for separating this Government from any contact with paper money at all. But while I am for that, I am opposed to the principle that this Government should force its paper money on other people. But when it undertakes to force its paper money on other people, let it take the medicine itself, and soon the whole system will be exploded.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Maryland, like the Senator from Illinois, reasons very persuasively in favor of this amendment, and I should be tempted to vote for it too if I could concur with either of those Senators in supposing that there was any hope that the House of Representatives would take advantage of the amendment as a reason for laying this bill upon the table. I have too much respect for the common sense and discernment of the House to leave any room to hope for such a result. Therefore I am compelled to vote upon the amendment in respect of its merits, and as I think it has no merits I shall vote against it.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, being unaccustomed to make public addresses, I shall have to vote for this proposition to set myself right on the record. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, in the chair.) The first question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

Mr. CONKLING. I think we ought to have the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, and I ask for them.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SARGENT. I am paired on this bill and the amendments to it for the rest of the day with the Senator from Louisiana, Mr. WEST.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Davis, Fenton, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Pease, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, and Spencer—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Cooper, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Ingalls, Norwood, Oglesby, Sargent, Schurz, Sprague, Stevenson, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—26.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I offer the following amendment, to be added to the first section of the bill:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, on and after January 1, 1876, shall redeem in coin United States legal-tender notes upon presentation at such places as he may designate, in sums of $1,000 or any multiple thereof, at the rate of $100 in coin for $110 in currency; and after six months from said date he shall redeem said notes, presented in sums as aforesaid at the places aforesaid, in coin at the rate of $100 in coin for $108 in currency. On and after January 1, 1877, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem said notes, presented in sums as aforesaid at the places aforesaid, in coin, at the rate of $100 in coin for $106 in currency; and six months thereafter he shall redeem said notes, presented as aforesaid at the places aforesaid, in coin, at the rate of $100 in coin for $104 in currency; and on and after January 1, 1878, the said Secretary shall redeem the said notes, presented in sums as aforesaid at the places aforesaid, in coin, at the rate of $100 in coin for $102 in currency; and six months thereafter the said Secretary shall redeem said notes, presented in sums as aforesaid at the places aforesaid, in coin, at the face value of said notes: Provided, That said notes shall at no time be redeemed at rates higher or greater than their value relatively to gold.

On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays. I do not care to debate it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, Mr. BAYARD.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. SPRAGUE, as I was on the question last voted on. I voted on it inadvertently. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent to withdraw his vote on the previous proposition. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Chair will, however, call attention to Rule 17:

When the yeas and nays shall be taken upon any question, in pursuance of the above rule, no Senator shall be permitted, under any circumstances whatever, to vote after the decision is announced from the Chair.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then I content myself with saying that I voted inadvertently.

Mr. HAMLIN. The rule simply prevents his voting after the announcement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks this correction may be made by unanimous consent. The name of the Senator from Maine will be erased from the roll on the preceding vote.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. BOUTWELL. I am not advised how he would vote on this particular question, and I content myself with this statement and do not vote.

The result was announced—yeas 7, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cooper, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Jones, Saulsbury, and Stockton—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Gordon, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, and Tipton—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Conkling, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hager, Harvey, Kelly, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Ransom, Sargent, Schurz, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—34.

So the amendment of Mr. SAULSBURY was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I offer an amendment now to come in after the section that was adopted on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] in the shape of two sections. I will say that while the amendment is not in accord with my own sentiments, I think it will be in accord with those of a large majority of the Senate. I take the amendment from a bill introduced in the House in relation to the redemption of the national-bank currency, and it is in so moderate a shape that I think it will commend itself to the general judgment of the Senate.

The words proposed to be inserted were read, as follows:

That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of the national-currency act approved June 3, 1864, and of the several acts in amendment thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation to be held and used only for the redemption of such circulation; and when the circulating notes of any such association or associations shall be presented, assorted or unassorted, for redemption, in sums of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, to the Secretary of the Treasury, or to the assistant treasurer in the city of New York, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Secretary of the Treasury to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally, on the first day of each month, or oftener, at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions; whereupon each association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum in United States notes equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed, under penalty of forfeiture of charter. And when such redemptions have been so reimbursed, the circulating notes so redeemed, or if worn, mutilated, or defaced, new notes instead, shall be forwarded to the respective associations: Provided, That each of said associations shall reimburse to the Treasury the costs of redemption and of supplying new notes in place of those redeemed. And the associations hereafter organized shall also severally reimburse to the Treasury the costs of engraving and printing their circulating notes: And provided further, That the entire amount of United States notes outstanding and in circulation at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $400,000,000, now authorized by existing law.

That upon all circulating notes hereafter issued, or hereafter to be issued, whenever the same shall come into the Treasury, in payment, or deposit for redemption or otherwise, there shall be printed, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, the charter numbers of the associations by which they are severally issued.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this proposition is pretty much the same as one that I offered yesterday. It is a part of the House bill in connection with free banking, just cut out of the House bill and offered. It applies only to a bill with free banking. Now I should like to ask the Senator why he offers it to this bill, and whether or not he will vote for the bill if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is utterly impossible for me to say what shape this bill is going to assume before we get through with it, and whether I shall vote for it or not. I do not think I ever can be induced to vote for it.

Mr. LOGAN. That is just what I supposed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. But I presume to say, notwithstanding, that the amendment which I offer is offered in good faith.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not doubting that at all.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. And it is offered to perfect the bill. There is no portion of the bill that has any provision of like character; and I think it will commend itself to the good sense of all Senators that there should be something of this sort. I do not say that this is entirely correct; but this was handed to me by a gentleman who has ideas of expansion as well as the Senator from Illinois, a member of the House, and I thought there were some good features in it; and seeing the entire absence of any provision of this sort in this bill, I ventured to offer it here.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I wish to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to this point, because it is important. These two sections in connection with free banking were offered in the House so as to correspond with the features of that bill in connection with the greenbacks; but it ought not to be offered to this bill, because the very redemption that is provided for national-bank notes, with very little change in it, is in the law now as it exists; and it is a mere change so far as the machinery is concerned. Substantially the very same thing exists to-day in the law. But if free banking was to be adopted, it might be well to make these little changes for the purpose of perfecting the machinery. This bill, however, only providing for $46,000,000 additional bank circulation, there is no necessity for any machinery in reference to it except that which is already in the law, because this is the law with very little change. I presume the Senator offered it with a view to have a vote, without any expectation of its being adopted, or, if it was adopted, without any intention of voting for the bill. I hope the friends of the bill will not permit amendments that ought not to be applicable to this particular feature of it as it stands to be adopted so as to embarrass it.

Mr. MORTON. I presume this amendment is not perfected even as the Senator from Vermont would have it. The Senator would not require the banks to keep 5 per cent. of greenbacks in the Treasury of the United States in addition to what they are now required to keep by law. I presume he would have this 5 per cent. a part of the reserve which they are now required to keep.

Mr. President, the banks are now required to redeem at their own counters; they are also required by the law to select one of the redemption cities in which they shall keep a redeeming agency. They are now required to redeem at two places: at their own counter and at one of the redemption cities. This amendment requires them to redeem at a third place, at the Treasury of the United States, and the amendment would require an additional reserve of 5 per cent. I can conceive no good to be accomplished by it. If you require them to redeem at the Treasury, then you ought to strike out the redemption cities. They ought not to be required to have more than two places to redeem. The old State banks were only required to redeem at their own counters. I believe that is the rule in regard to all banks, even where they pay in specie, that they are only required to pay at their own counters. The objection that the national-bank notes are not presented for redemption grows out of the fact that the national-bank currency is so good that nobody cares about having it redeemed. That is the objection.

Mr. SCOTT. I rose when the Senator from Illinois concluded, but I gave way to the Senator from Indiana when I saw that he was not aware that I had been recognized; and I rose for the purpose of propounding to the Senator from Vermont the very same question that the Senator from Indiana has started. I am glad he has done it; for if it be the intention to add 5 per cent. to the amount of greenbacks which the national banks are required to keep on hand, then I shall offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, releasing the banks altogether from keeping any reserve on their circulation. At present, as the Senator from Indiana has stated, they are required to redeem at their counters; they are required to select one of the redemption cities, and may keep there three-fifths of their reserve; and if this be added to it, it would make a reserve of 20 per cent. required of all the country banks instead of 15. I am opposed to this amendment unless it is accompanied with a release of the banks from keeping a reserve on circulation altogether. If it be the intention of the Senator from Vermont to take a vote on it as it stands, I will move to add to the section these words:

And said associations shall not hereafter be required to keep on hand any amount of legal-tender notes as a reserve upon their circulation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to amend the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will modify my amendment by inserting the words "shall be counted as part of their reserve" after the word "circulation;" so as to read:

That every association organized or to be organized under the provisions of the national currency act, approved June 3, 1864, and of the several acts in amendment thereof, shall at all times keep and have on hand in deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used only for the redemption of such circulation, and which shall be counted as part of their reserve, &c.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I dislike very much to take up time; but still I must call the attention of the Senator to a burden that this imposes on the banks. The redemption now is through their own correspondents, the choice of the banks in New York. It is proposed by this amendment to make the redemption at the Treasury and subtreasuries of the United States. The process will be to send its currency back to the banks. If it is confined to Washington, it compels them to redeem at a political center, not a financial one. The process in New York now is, they having selected their own correspondents, that the difference is made up through exchanges. In this case it will require the currency to be sent back and the banks will be compelled to pay the express charges.

Another thing; it proposes to characterize the currency, to localize it, and thus start a system of discrimination between the issues of the different banks. I am opposed to anything of that kind. The bank currency passes now universally throughout the country; but the tendency of this amendment is to individualize the issues of each bank and gradually create discrimination against one and another that may be more distant than others. That will be the effect, and it compels the banks to pay the expense of sending back the currency to their own counters. Now they do it through their exchanges, without expense, and it is done in New York where the balances naturally increase. Here it is proposed to be at a political center, out of the financial channel. It seems to me the amendment ought not to be adopted.

Mr. HOWE. I understand that it is even worse than the Senator from Michigan suggests. It seems to me to impose a very direct and not a light burden upon the Treasury Department. It makes the Treasury Department the agent of the eastern banks where the money of the country is concentrated, in assorting that money and collecting greenbacks for it. Two hundred million dollars or two hundred and fifty million dollars are on deposit in Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston continually. If I understand this proposition, it says to bankers and brokers, "Send your money en masse right into the Treasury; the Treasurer shall find clerks to count and assort it, and return you greenbacks for it at once, and take their chances of collecting it from the country banks all over the United States in thirty days." It seems to me the Treasury is made directly—I do not want to use any offensive term—the agent to effect these collections. If the Government finds the material with which the banks shall redeem their promises, I think that is enough for the Government to do.

Mr. MORTON. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin is a very important one. That would undoubtedly be the effect of the provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Indiana remarked a moment ago that there was now redemption both at the bank-counters and in the redemption cities. That is not so in practice. There is no occasion to send notes home for redemption at the bank-counters, because the persons who desired to get greenbacks for their notes would not pay the expense of sending them home. Redemption in the redemption cities has proved to be a failure. I doubt whether in the whole history of the banking law there has been $10,000 redeemed in the redemption cities. It is simply a means by which the banks get interest on deposits in the redemption cities. There are now two thousand banks. Think of the difficulty of assorting the notes of particular banks. Suppose it was desired to select the notes of a particular bank for redemption, either at its counter or at the place for redemption in a city; it is practically impossible; the difficulty is so great that it is never done.

Then there is another difficulty. Who knows where these bank-notes can be redeemed? Who designates in what particular bank and in which city is the place of redemption of any country bank? I doubt very much whether the bankers could find it out. The redeeming agents are designated by each bank respectively, how? By a notice to the Comptroller of the Currency. Is that published? Is that known? Not at all. You may take a national-bank note out of your pocket. There is nothing on the face of the note to show that it is redeemable at the First National Bank of New York. How can you find out which one of the numerous banks in the redemption cities is the place for the redemption of that note? You might possibly by writing to the Comptroller of the Currency in Washington find out the bank and city where it is to be redeemed. But that is practically impossible.

We have now bank paper which is convertible into a greenback by law at two places of redemption, and yet is practically inconvertible into greenbacks at any place of redemption. It cannot be sent home to a remote point for redemption, because that is too expensive and troublesome; it is too difficult to assort, too difficult to select those particular notes. It cannot be sent to a redeeming bank in a redemption city, because that is not ascertainable either on the face of the note or by any particular regulation of law.

The purpose of this section in the eye of the gentleman who penned it, and who himself is not only in favor of free banking but of an increased volume of legal-tender notes, was to secure something like an oscillation, a movement backward and forward, of this currency to prevent its redundancy; and it seems to me that he has fallen on the best expedient to accomplish this purpose. It is true I do not think it amounts to much, because as you increase the volume of greenbacks and swell the volume of bank-notes there is no great occasion to send the latter home for redemption; but certainly this will enable the holder of national-bank notes who desires to have legal-tender notes to get them by presenting them at the Treasury of the United States.

I have it from a member on whose word I rely, that the Treasurer of the United States says that practically there will be no difficulty in carrying this section into operation; that 5 per cent. is an ample reserve for the circulation of banks, and this would enable persons who desire to obtain legal-tenders either for the purpose of paying a debt or for any other purpose they may have in view to get them. Now, practically anybody may refuse to take a national-bank note in payment of debt. Therefore it is sometimes a proper and right thing to endeavor to get greenbacks. If the volume of bank-notes is to be largely increased there ought to be some mode by which these notes may be converted into greenbacks. There is no mode now. The very fact that these notes are all of the same similitude makes redemption impracticable under the present law. All the notes of two thousand banks are precisely alike, and the very name of the bank, the very designation and character of the bank and its location are in such small type that a man past fifty years would have to put on his spectacles to find out where the note was issued, so that redemption is impracticable. It was to meet that point that another provision contained in this section was inserted by the member who framed it. As each bank is known by a number, numbering from one up to nineteen hundred and odd, according to the date of its charter, it is proposed—which can be done at once by an ordinary machine—to stamp on the face of the note the number of the bank issuing it. Everybody can then ascertain what bank issued any particular note by its number. Now, practically it is impossible to have redemption, as you will see by taking up a pile of bills and assorting them over. You would find it difficult to pick out the notes of banks in one State without referring to localities in it.

I think I understand the object of the section. Indeed I have conversed with the gentleman who drew it. He does not agree with me in opinion; but his object in this is perfectly right and just, to facilitate redemption so as to promote as far as practicable under this system of redemption in greenbacks the oscillation, the movement backward and forward of currency, so that if bank-notes are unduly issued in a particular section of country they may flow back.

Now, take the State of Massachusetts. Massachusetts has issued $59,000,000 of circulating notes, and they are scattered all over the western country. If the bankers and people of the West could send those notes to the Treasury with the hope of getting greenbacks to carry on their operations, why should they not have that privilege? But now practically it is impossible; there is no redemption, no plan of redemption. Although the law guarantees one, yet it is utterly futile. No man can now convert a bank-note into a greenback without more labor and more trouble than the whole operation would be worth to him. It was merely to remove that difficulty that this section was framed. I shall vote for it, not that I think it will accomplish any great results, but it will certainly tend to permit this oscillation backward and forward of notes from the place of issue to the place where they are loaned, and then let them float back again to the bank or the Treasury, where they will be redeemed by a greenback.

Mr. HOWE. I am very much inclined to think that this measure would get up a little more oscillation than would be agreeable, especially to the banks. I guess you had better keep the circulation as still as you can.

Let me say to the Senator from Ohio what I think is the reason you have not any practical redemption; nobody wants it. What is the use of changing a bank-note into a greenback? Neither of them is money in a commercial sense nor in any honest sense. The greenback is more abundant than the bank-note. You say the greenback is issued by the Government; the bank-note is supported by the Government also. The greenback is a promise of the Government to pay a dollar; the bank-note is supported by the promise of the Government to pay a dollar and ten cents. There is a dollar and ten cents of the Government credit pledged for the redemption of the bank-note. The bank-note is the stronger of the two.

Mr. MORTON. It is a kangaroo.

Mr. HOWE. It has got the longest legs, you see. Then in paying debts every domestic creditor takes the bank-note just as readily as the United States note, and when you want to pay a foreign debt you cannot pay it with either. What is the use of such a redemption as that? You might provide for redeeming whisky with water and expect that to be practical. Most of the people would prefer to keep the whisky, just as most of the people would prefer to keep the bank-note, because it is the strongest; a good reason for keeping it. [Laughter.] But the fact is, that all those who deal in money care so little whether they have the one note or the other that the banks have taken in and paid out both indiscriminately. You cannot go into a bank and get $100 without getting all kinds of currency. But the Senator from Ohio suggests that if the United States Treasury will take upon itself this labor of assorting the notes, counting them out, sending them back and forward, then you will get up an oscillation. I have not the least manner of doubt about it, but as I do not hunger for oscillation, I think I shall vote against this amendment.

Mr. FENTON. There is a way of securing redemptions, a practical plan if we want to adopt it, but I do not think we do. I have not seen any such disposition on the part of the Senate when they have had the opportunity, and they have it still. This amendment would not be very successful if it was adopted in securing redemptions in my judgment, and if it would be it ought not to be adopted, for I doubt whether the Government ought to be turned into an assorting and clearing house for the banks of this country. I shall vote against it.

Mr. SCOTT. I offered my amendment to the section offered by the Senator from Vermont, not because I am entirely favorable to that section, but if it is to be adopted I want my amendment to accompany it. My view of this central redemption for national-bank notes is, that it is at entire variance with the whole original theory of the national-bank system. We know it was a part of it, but the idea of the national-bank system was to apportion circulation to wealth and population in certain localities, for the purpose of accommodating the business of those localities; and if there be any way by which that is to be accomplished it ought to be by keeping that national-bank circulation in the very localities to which the law originally apportioned it. To require these banks to keep a portion of their reserves in a distant locality is in effect taking away from the localities intended to be benefited by the apportionment the benefit which the law intended to confer upon them. Therefore, I have never been very favorably impressed with the system of establishing redeeming agencies at the commercial centers for national-bank paper; for I think it is at war with the original idea of apportioning the circulation for the benefit of business in different localities according to wealth and population.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In order to understand this amendment, I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether the amendment does not provide for assorting the bills so that they will be sent to the places where they are intended to circulate? It struck me that that was just the benefit, if there was any, of this amendment, that it was a mode by which the bills which had wandered off thousands of miles away from their locality would through this channel be brought back to the place whence they originally issued. Am I correct?

Mr. SCOTT. If that were the only practical effect, that might be so; but it is evident the practical effect of it is intended to be to give the money-changers at the commercial centers the opportunity of getting greenbacks for this national-bank circulation. That is the effect of it. The other is a mere collateral affair, and not the original purpose of it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. When I introduced this amendment I stated that it did not precisely harmonize with my own views. I would be much more in favor of redemption at the city of New York. But as we have indications from enough of those who control a majority here to show what would be the fate of this proposition, and it is quite evident that the minority have "no rights which white men are bound to respect" as to offering amendments, [laughter,] I withdraw the amendment, and I hope the majority will propose something from a quarter that they will be ready to accept themselves.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that we now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LOGAN. O, I hope not; let us go on and finish the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator allow me to interpose a motion before that?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, to-morrow is a day that is observed with peculiar solemnity by the whole Christian world, and although I was not educated in the doctrine that accepts it as the authentic anniversary of the event which it commemorates, I have great respect for those who do. I believe it has not been customary during the long session for the Senate to sit on Good Friday. I therefore move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next; or as we have not sat on a Saturday at all during this session, I will move that when we adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Has there ever been an instance when that has been done?

Mr. ANTHONY. Has there ever been an instance during the long session when we have sat on Good Friday? I am sure that we have adjourned over that day. I cannot say that the practice has been uniform, but I know we have done so at times.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not remember an instance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Never but once.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Saturday next.

Several SENATORS. Say Monday.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would prefer Monday, but I understood some Senators to object to that.

Several SENATORS. No, no; say Monday.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well; then I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOREMAN in the chair.) The motion can be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORTON. If it is out of order, I object.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should think the Senator would allow us to test the sense of the Senate. I do not want to impose, and I certainly cannot impose, on the Senate any adjournment that they do not desire; but the Senator will allow us to test the question, will he not?

Mr. MORTON. I asked the other day to move to reconsider a vote to adjourn over, and I was told very promptly by the Senator from New York and half a dozen others that it was not in order, and was required to take my seat.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I move to lay the pending bill on the table, the object being to have an opportunity to interpose a motion for the order of business, which I supposed was always granted. That motion is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order, but it is not debatable.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope, however Senators may vote on the question of adjournment, they will give us a chance to test the sense of the Senate upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not open to debate.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to lay the pending bill on the table.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. For the single purpose of moving an adjournment over.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us take the question by the sound, without the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORTON. No; let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well; then let us lay the bill on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 22, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Schurz, and Windom—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Ferry of Michigan, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Logan, Merrimon, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, and Tipton—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Lewis, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Pease, Ransom, Sargent, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, and Wright—29.

So the bill was laid on the table.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. No. 334) to remove the political disabilities of William L. Cabell, of Texas.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ANTHONY. I now move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I move to amend the motion so as to provide for a meeting on Saturday next.

Mr. MORTON. Is this question debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. MORTON. The proposition to throw away the day to-morrow, in view of all the circumstances, it seems to me, cannot be justified; and I will say to my friend from Rhode Island that I think we ought to be allowed to take a vote on the pending financial question without this sort of delay being interposed. The proposition to adjourn over Good Friday is contrary to the usages of the Senate. I think no Senator here can remember that it has ever been done. There are many other holy days which it would be equally proper to adjourn over as that of Good Friday, that are observed by the Catholic and Episcopalian and other churches. I think we all understand this. I hope now that this sort of proposition will not be interposed to the final decision of this question.

Mr. ANTHONY. When I am charged with wasting the time of the Senate by any Senator who has not spoken more hours than I have minutes during this session I will defend myself. Until then I can stand upon my record. [Laughter.]

Mr. TIPTON. It is very evident that if we lose to-morrow on account of our piety, we shall take some Sunday in order to make up for it. [Laughter.] We have been in the habit of doing that, sitting on Sunday at the end of a session; and I have no doubt we shall be called upon to sit all day some Sunday in order that we may now piously take a day that our constituents do not expect us to take from the public business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves to amend the motion by substituting Saturday for Monday. That is the pending question.

Mr. CONKLING. That will merely waste the day. We shall not do anything on Saturday.

Mr. MORTON. I want to say one thing further. The remark of my friend from Rhode Island does not change the character of this proposition in the least. I shall make no defense against what he said.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator knows or conceives that I have not made this motion in good faith, or that it has any character that does not appear on the face of it, I would thank him to state it. I am not in the habit of trifling with the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. It occurs to me that this is very much like trifling with the Senate.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I have offered my amendment in good faith. I do not know that the vote just taken is an indication that the Senate proposes to adjourn over to-morrow; but if they are disposed to adjourn over, it seems to me they cannot do less than meet here on Saturday. If it is the object to pay respect to Good Friday, then I meet Senators upon that point, and ask them to meet here on Saturday. We are just as able to meet here on Saturday as we are on Friday, and if we give away Friday, we ought to take Saturday

It has been stated by others that there has been a disposition to prolong this discussion and waste the time of the Senate. The country has so felt, and has asked us to settle this question of finance one way or the other; and now in the face of that, with the measure pending and evidently a majority disposed to perfect the bill, it is proposed to throw away two days.

Mr. MORTON. To adjourn over three days.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If it is just that we should give one day, I am willing to give that one day, but no more; and I am willing and ready to come here on Saturday and try and do my duty.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think I shall ask my friend from Michigan if his motion is according to the new parliamentary law which has been laid down here within a few days, that no Senator has a right to move an amendment to a proposition unless he is going to vote for it? If the Senator is going to vote for the proposition as amended, then I admit his right to move the amendment. I think he and his friends have laid down the doctrine in the case of my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and others, that they have no right to move an amendment unless they are going to vote for the bill.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. That was on a financial question, not a religious one. [Laughter.] The Senator from Rhode Island has presented a new precedent, adjourning over Good Friday. I have no knowledge of such an expedient, but I am disposed to defer on religious matters as rapidly and as fully as I can to the Senator from Rhode Island. We have been applying rules, however, to a financial question. This is a new one. I was not aware of it until my attention was called to it. Now I propose to vote according to the amendment that I propose, and then my feeling is to vote down the whole proposition, because I am opposed to an adjournment over. I am disposed to spend the Sabbath religiously; but to adjourn over a day now, when we have spent four months on this great question, I think is asking a little too much.

Mr. BOGY. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Michigan will be adopted, and that the Senate will adjourn until Saturday. I appreciate the argument made by the Senator from Indiana and also by the Senator from Michigan, that the pending bill ought to be disposed of; but it must not be forgotten that to-morrow is a day that is held in high veneration by the entire Christian world, and I think it would be promotive of good even on this great financial question if we observe that day which is commemorated by the Christian world as the day upon which the Saviour of mankind was crucified. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Michigan will be adopted, and that the Senate will adjourn over until Saturday.

Mr. GORDON. Is it proposed by Senators on the other side to make it a day of prayer and fasting, that they may get light to guide them on the financial question? [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator who desires to adjourn now will change the motion and move an executive session. There is occasion for an executive session.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Very well; I modify the motion in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I never take advantage of the Senate, and I do not wish to do anything that may seem to do so; and therefore I give notice that to-morrow I shall move to adjourn, so that Senators may be here or not as they see fit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island gives notice that to-morrow he will move an adjournment; but whether at twelve o'clock or during the afternoon he does not state.

Mr. ANTHONY. On the assembling of the Senate to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 2, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS, ETC.

Mr. PLATT, of New York. On behalf of my colleague, Mr. CLARKE, who is confined to his bed by illness, I desire to present the petitions of merchants, manufacturers, bankers, and leading business men of the city of Rochester, New York, praying a return to specie payments and that there may be no more issue of paper currency, that it may be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. FORT. I shall have to object unless others can be allowed the same privilege. Hundreds and thousands of petitions come here praying the very reverse of this petition. I am perfectly willing that this petition shall be presented if we can all present other petitions in the same way; but there will be hundreds of them every morning.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let them all be referred under the rule.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the petition will be referred under the rule.

CLAIMS FOR ADDITIONAL BOUNTIES.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time a bill to extend the time for filing claims for additional bounties under the act of July 28, 1866. I think there will be no objection to it.

The bill was read for information. It proposes to extend the time for filing claims for additional bounties under the act of July 28, 1866, and which expired by limitation on the 30th of January, 1874, until the 30th of January, 1875, and to provide that all claims for such bounties filed in the proper Department after the 30th of January, 1874, and before the passage of this bill shall be deemed to have been filed in due time, and shall be considered and decided without refiling.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I must object to the present consideration of that bill. It will give rise to debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow it to be referred to the Committee on War Claims with permission to report at any time. It is a matter of great importance to the soldiers.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. It ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs, if to any committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw the bill for the present and introduce it on Monday, if I can get the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order of business.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. DONNAN. I rise to a privileged report from the Committee on Printing. I report back adversely the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House three thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs as to the reduction of the Army.

The resolution was laid upon the table.

COMMISSIONER OF FORESTRY.

Mr. DONNAN. I report back from the Committee on Printing the following resolution, with a recommendation that the same be adopted:

Resolved, That there be printed five thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee on the Public Lands on the message of the President in relation to the appointment of a commissioner of forestry.

I hold in my hand the report referred to. It consists of some one hundred and sixteen printed pages well indexed, and was made by officers of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. It is a very able report, and there has been so much call for it that the committee have deemed it advisable to recommend the printing of five thousand extra copies. The type is now standing, and the cost of these extra copies will be some sixteen or seventeen cents per copy.

The resolution was adopted.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. STORM. I rise to a personal explanation, and what I consider to be a question of privilege. I find in the RECORD this morning, upon looking over the remarks of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] as there printed, certain remarks of a personal character which were not uttered upon this floor during the debate of yesterday. I rise merely to call attention to the fact and to condemn the practice of gentlemen adding to their remarks others of a personal character which were not made upon this floor. I think no gentleman in this House should resort to such practice.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman mean personal in reference to a member of this House?

Mr. STORM. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENDALL. I did not understand the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. STORM. I say that the gentleman from Nevada, in his speech as published in the RECORD this morning, has some remarks of a personal character which were not uttered upon this floor yesterday. I mention this fact in order to condemn the practice.

Mr. KENDALL. And I say that if the gentleman had paid attention to what I said he would have heard what is reported in the RECORD this morning.

Mr. STORM. I say that the gentleman has added to his remarks, and the reporters' notes will show it. He does not deny it.

Mr. KENDALL. I do deny it.

Mr. STORM. I move that the RECORD be corrected by striking out that portion not uttered yesterday by the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] raises the point that there are published in the RECORD this morning, as remarks of the gentleman from Nevada, some remarks of a personal nature which were not uttered upon the floor, and asks that the same should be excluded from the bound copy of the RECORD. The Chair is of opinion that that is a question of privilege.

Mr. KENDALL. I ask that the sentences be read to which exception be taken.

The SPEAKER. They will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The gentleman from Pennsylvania who offered this amendment, [Mr. NEGLEY,] and his colleague, [Mr. STORM,] who are so familiar with the condition and wants of the mines and miners of the Comstock, though neither has ever seen a silver mine, bray out their usual argument that this is another movement of the "California Bank ring" to defeat the long-suffering and much-persecuted Sutro!

* * * * * * *

I had, Mr. Speaker, at one time thought of replying to the other gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STORM,] usually so reticent, who the other day became so suddenly enlightened about the wants of the poor miners in the "sage-brush;" but I forbear; it is not worth the while; it is not of the slightest consequence.

Mr. STORM. Those remarks, I say, were not uttered upon this floor.

Mr. KENDALL. I wish to say, that standing here in this place on yesterday, where I now stand this morning——

Mr. NEGLEY. Allow me just a moment to say to the gentleman from Nevada and to the House, that so far as any reference is made to me it is a matter of perfect indifference.

The SPEAKER. That is not the question before the House.

Mr. KENDALL. I wish to state that during the debate of yesterday on the bill which has been referred to, standing here where I now stand, the five minutes which I was allowed to address the House expired. I then stated that I should refer to certain extracts from newspapers that had come to me in reference to this bill, and should ask to have them included in my remarks, which I have done. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] who has just now resumed his seat, then standing at my left, should have heard that I said substantially in regard to himself what appears in the RECORD of this morning. Now, sir, the gentleman is somewhat sensitive about the allusion that is made to him, and I am glad of it. It is a sign of good health when the patient has a little sensibility left. My allusion, though not in kind terms to him, was of such a nature that I am a little surprised the gentleman should rise here this morning to a personal explanation and ask that the RECORD be corrected. However that may be does not concern the matter. I repeat that the remarks which have been read were essentially and substantially made here in the course of that debate. That is all I have to say in explanation, not in defense, for I make none and need none.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman does not deny, he cannot deny, that he did not make yesterday in the debate the remarks which the Clerk has read.

Mr. KENDALL. I say that I did make them substantially.

Mr. STORM. I appeal to the notes taken by the reporter at the time, which I have not seen; but I say they will not be found there.

The SPEAKER. That is a question of fact, which the reporters' notes will settle. There have been several instances in which remarks of a personal nature have been interjected into the reporters' notes; and such cases have always given rise to unpleasant debate in the House. A notable case was that of a then member from Ohio, in which case the matter was referred to a committee of the House. It has uniformly been held that where a member revises the reporters' notes, or where he obtains leave to print remarks not delivered, everything of a personal nature, not spoken on the floor, should be carefully excluded. This is a part of the common law of the House.

Mr. SPEER. I ask that the reporter produce his notes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the manuscript of the reporters is not in the House, but necessarily at the printing office.

Mr. STORM. I hope that the language printed in the RECORD may be corrected by reference to the reporters' notes. Without having seen those notes, I am ready to stand by them.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. In connection with this matter, I beg leave to inquire of the Chair by what authority the expressions "laughter," "sensation," &c., are put into the debates by the reporters; whether such things are any part of the proceedings of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then I request the Speaker to direct that such expressions be hereafter omitted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that all those things should be omitted from the official report of the House, because they are in contravention of the rules; and to insert them in the report is only putting upon record that members are violating the rules of the House.

Mr. KENDALL. I am just informed (and I ask the indulgence of the House to say it) that gentlemen who were immediately around me yesterday morning did hear substantially, and almost identically, the language to which exception is taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Even if the notes of the reporter should not peradventure show the language, there are many gentlemen here around me who say that I did use substantially the language which I have asseverated I did use.

Mr. STORM. Now the gentleman is creeping out of a very small hole. I was as much interested in the gentleman's remarks yesterday as any man on the floor of this House; and I say he did not use the remark which is applied to me in the printed report. There was a remark of that kind applied to my colleague, [Mr. NEGLEY,] but the other remark was not applied to me at the time the gentleman spoke.

Mr. KENDALL. I simply refer to other gentlemen here.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. In order that the reporters may definitely understand their duty in this matter, I ask that the statement which has been made by the Chair in regard to the insertion of parenthetical remarks by the reporters may be considered as an instruction to them on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. Attention being called to the matter, the Chair directs the Official Reporters that hereafter all parenthetical remarks, such as "laughter," "applause," or anything of that kind, shall be omitted from their reports. Such things should never have recognition in the official reports of the House, any more than applause in the galleries. They are distinctly against the rules of the House.

In view of the question raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STORM]—whether it is to be brought up again upon an appeal to the reporters' notes the Chair does not know—the Chair begs again to remark, and to impress upon members, that the common law of the House which has always obtained in the revision of the official reports is, that it is not allowable for a gentleman to interject into his printed remarks anything of a personal nature not spoken on the floor. Members are all aware that great latitude is allowed in the printing of speeches and in the alteration of spoken remarks of an impersonal character. But as to everything personal, every member's sense of propriety will recognize at once that such remarks should be strictly confined to the report made by the official organs of the House.

Mr. KENDALL. I wish to appeal to members around me who are willing to rise in their places and say that I did use the language which appears in the report. Although the language to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] takes exception is not of an offensive nature, I did use it in this debate, as members around me will asseverate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this matter has gone far enough.

Mr. KENDALL. I wish to set myself right on this question. Gentlemen who were near me yesterday will, if called on, rise in their places and say that I used the language appearing in the report.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, there is a Senate amendment——

Mr. CONGER. I have been trying for something like thirty days to get the floor away from my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES]——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has a privileged report, upon a bill which his committee has been authorized to report at any time. The Chair understands him, however, to yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER.]

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

DEFICIENCY IN APPROPRIATION FOR WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that a communication presented yesterday from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the amount of deficiency in the appropriation for his Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ALASKA FUR-TRADE.

Mr. CONGER. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report back, with the recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 2667) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to gather authentic information as to the condition and importance of the fur-trade in the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. NEGLEY. I desire to ask the Speaker if I am to be taken off the floor by this and other business without being heard?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has a privileged report which he has the right to make, the House having conceded to that committee the right to report at any time.

Mr. NEGLEY. I am not questioning the Speaker's action, but that of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who, when I am on the floor, calls for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The call for the regular order prevented the Chair from recognizing the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. NEGLEY. I wish to know whether the gentleman from Ohio proposes to parcel out the time of the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not doing so; the Chair is doing that.

Mr. NEGLEY. I take notice, Mr. Speaker, that every morning when we attempt to pass any bill in the interest of members, which will occasion no debate, a few gentlemen call for the regular order and take us off the floor. I think it shows a lack of courtesy to other gentlemen who have pressing business, not of their own, but others.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan reports back a bill, the title of which has been read, from the Committee on Commerce.

The bill was read. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is thereby, authorized to appoint some person, qualified by experience and education, a special agent for the purpose of visiting the various trading stations and Indian villages in the Territory of Alaska, the seal-islands, and the large islands to the north of them, in Behring Sea, for the purpose of collecting and reporting to him all possible authentic information upon the present condition of the seal-fisheries of Alaska, the haunts and habits of the seal, and the preservation and extension of the fisheries as a source of revenue to the United States; together with like information respecting the fur-bearing animals of Alaska generally, the statistics of the fur-trade, and the condition of the people or natives, especially those upon whom the successful prosecution of the fisheries and fur-trade is dependent; such agent to receive a compensation of eight dollars per day while actually thus employed, with all actual and necessary traveling expenses incurred therein; provided that the appointment made under the act shall not continue longer than two years.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I objected to the bill yesterday, but did not have time to state my point of order. I wish to know now whether the point of order, that this bill involves an appropriation and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, does not lie against it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, reported this bill for consideration by the House from that committee. It was objected to, but was permitted to go to the Committee on Commerce with the right to report it back at any time.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I should like to have the question of order settled whether the right to report at any time relieves the bill from the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe the status of the bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts was asking to have the bill considered in the House when he reported it from the Committee on Ways and Means. Objection was made, but permission was given to have it considered in the House, provided it first went to the Committee on Commerce. It now comes back under that condition of things. The gentleman's point of order would lie against the bill if there had been no condition of that kind.

Mr. WOOD. Yesterday I understood one objection prevented the presentation of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It did, because at that time the bill from the Committee on Mines and Mining had possession of the floor, under the operation of the previous question, but there is nothing of a higher nature which will now cut it out. The right to report at any time is good except when anything is occupying the attention of the House, placed there by a suspension of the rules or by the seconding of the previous question. The report is in order now because there is nothing of a higher privilege.

Mr. POTTER. Do I understand there is an entry in the Journal that it was the understanding this bill should be considered in the House when it was reported?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it was so understood and implied, if not distinctly recorded. The gentleman will of course observe the mere right to report at any time for reference to the Committee of the Whole gives the bill no advantage at all. There would then have been no gain; and the gentleman from Massachusetts, in order to avoid having it go to the Committee of the Whole, made this arrangement upon the floor of the House previous to the reference of the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. POTTER. That it might be reported at any time, which was understood to be to report for consideration in the House?

The SPEAKER. There would have been no gain unless that had been the condition; because if such had not been the condition it would have been better for the gentleman to have allowed his bill to go to the Committee of the Whole at that time.

Mr. POTTER. I merely desire to be instructed by the Chair as to the effect of leave being given to report at any time, as it was at my suggestion that that privilege was granted in this case.

The SPEAKER. It was done by unanimous consent; for at that time a single objection would have carried the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Do I understand the Chair to rule that when a committee is authorized to report at any time, the point of order that the bill makes an appropriation does not lie?

The SPEAKER. Not at all. The Chair does not so decide. The Chair will again rehearse what took place, that there may be no misunderstanding. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, reported this bill and asked for its consideration in the House at that time. There was some objection made to that. Had the point of order been then made, the bill would necessarily have gone to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. But after some conversation it was agreed by unanimous consent that the bill would not be objected to if allowed to go to the Committee on Commerce, with the right to the committee to report it back at any time.

Mr. WOOD. Do I understand the Chair to rule that the privilege given to any committee of this House to report at any time does away with the privilege of a member to raise the point of order as to what should be done with the bill when it comes back here?

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. WOOD. Then I raise the point of order that, as this bill makes an appropriation, it should go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. That point of order was expressly waived. The understanding only goes to the point of order that was waived. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] will observe that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] having control of the bill would not have permitted it to go to the Committee on Commerce, under the right to report it back at any time, merely to lose two weeks before its going on the Calendar. If the point of order had been made at that time, the bill would have gone to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. But that was waived, and instead of going to the Committee of the Whole the bill was sent to the Committee on Commerce with the right to report it back at any time.

Mr. WOOD. My recollection was that when the gentleman from Massachusetts made that report objection was made, and the bill was sent to the Committee on Commerce with only one privilege—no question of order being raised—the privilege simply of reporting it back at any time. No unanimous consent was given that the bill should be considered irrespective of the point of order.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from New York consider was the motive in sending it to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. WOOD. The committee could report it at any time.

The SPEAKER. What for? What was the motive on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in having the bill go to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. WOOD. Because objection was made to it.

The SPEAKER. Objection was not made to reporting it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to answer the question just put by the Chair. That subject-matter had been uniformly before the Committee on Commerce before, and for that reason I objected myself to the consideration of the bill until it had been referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Precisely. But one objection would have carried it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then, over the objection of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly; but I said it should go to the committee that uniformly had had jurisdiction of that subject.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Is it not also true that the bill was considered in the House, and on consideration referred to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. DAWES. I agreed to the bill going to the Committee on Commerce on the assurance that that committee should have the privilege of reporting it for consideration at any time.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Did not the gentleman's own committee have that right?

Mr. DAWES. My committee did not have the right to report at any time. My recollection is that I asked unanimous consent to report the bill for present consideration on the ground that it was a matter of urgency. That is my recollection, that I asked unanimous consent to report it for present action. After I had so reported it, and it had been read for action at the present time, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] of the Committee on Commerce, suggested that that was a subject which had been in charge of the Committee on Commerce. I replied that I knew the matter originally did come from the Committee on Commerce, and I did not know exactly why the Secretary of the Treasury had referred it to our committee; but I had not the slightest objection to its going to the Committee on Commerce, provided they had the right to report it back at any time. That was agreed to, and it was handed over to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill had some discussion in the House. There was, I thought, a consideration in the House to that extent. I had, as I understood, the consent of the House to report it for action at any time. The action at that time was taking it from the House and referring it to the Committee on Commerce, with leave to report it at any time. That is the way it struck me.

Mr. POTTER. I understand the facts in respect of the introduction and reference of the bill to the Committee on Commerce exactly as the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated them, except that I did not understand that the House gave any leave to consider the bill at that time. In other respects I agree with the gentleman. I do not desire to antagonize the bill at this time; I believe it was at my suggestion, as well as that of others, that the Committee on Commerce were authorized to report at any time. I can see very well that no experienced parliamentarian would allow a bill to be referred, as this bill was, to a committee with leave to report at any time, if upon its being reported back one objection would send it to the Committee of the Whole. I only wish to call attention to that being the effect of such an understanding, so that we may have the benefit of it in other cases; and if a gentleman desires to save the point of order that a bill must go to the Committee of the Whole, he must not allow it to be referred to a committee with leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. O, no; the Chair could not allow it to be drawn into a precedent in that respect. The mere fact that a committee is authorized to report at any time does not affect the point of order.

Mr. DAWES. I do not so understand it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so rule.

Mr. DAWES. I do not understand that the bill comes before the House by any such ruling as that.

Mr. WOOD. Allow me to say a word in reply to my colleague, [Mr. POTTER.] The Committee on Ways and Means had not the right to report this bill at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not so asserted.

Mr. WOOD. The object of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means was to have the bill referred to another committee. It received no consideration in the House; but the gentleman, by having it referred to another committee privileged to report at any time, thus obtained a privilege which the bill had not before.

Mr. DAWES. If the Chair will indulge me, I will say that I very well recollect that after I had reported the bill, I went on to give reasons for action upon it and for the necessity of prompt action, and to explain the principle upon which the bill was framed. That called the attention of the Committee on Commerce to the bill, and a member of that committee, while I was discussing the merits of the bill, suggested that the whole matter originated with the Committee on Commerce and should be considered by that committee. I was discussing the merits of the bill and explaining why it was proper that it should be passed at the present time, and then the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] suggested that it ought to have gone to the Committee on Commerce. I saw then, while the bill was pending, that the Committee on Commerce might think it proper to antagonize the passage of the bill, and I said at once to myself that I would rather it should go to that committee immediately and let them see it for themselves and have leave to report it back at any time. But that was while I was discussing the merits of the bill. If I recollect aright I had gone so far as to give a history of the fur-seal trade; I have not thought of it since; but I am confident that I was discussing the merits of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not had time to refer to the record, but the recollection of the Chair differs in one respect from that of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The Chair does not think that full leave had been given to consider the bill in the House, but pending an explanation, after which objection might have been made, an objection being made to considering it in the House, this arrangement was entered into. It was so far made that the record on the back of the bill, the official indorsement by the Clerk, is "March 26, 1874, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, with leave to report at any time." Now the fact that a bill has been once read takes it beyond the point of order, and the general understanding was that the bill was read twice. Gentlemen of the House will all observe that the mere right to report for reference to the Committee of the Whole is about the smallest privilege that can be given to a bill. A reference to the Committee of the Whole leaves it so entirely under the control of the opponents of the bill that any one is ready to give his assent to have it referred to another committee in this way, and therefore the gentleman from Massachusetts, acting with an intelligent knowledge of the rules as he always does, would not have consented to have the bill referred to the Committee on Commerce simply for the purpose of having it reported back to go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understand, then, the decision of the Chair to be that the bill having been read twice the point of order could not be made. Does not a bill have to be read twice before it can go to a committee?

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but when the bill itself was brought into the House, and allowed to be twice read, the question being upon its third reading, the point would not apply.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understand that the bill was reported from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The bill was read twice and referred to the Committee on Commerce. It had not been read twice and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, for this is a new bill with a new number.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Ah! then, it was an original bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means without having been referred to them.

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. Now, if these matters are settled satisfactorily——

Mr. POTTER. If the point had been made in time it would have been good?

The SPEAKER. It would. The question is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. BECK. Is there to be no explanation?

Mr. CONGER. If desired I will make a brief explanation.

Mr. BECK. The bill was considered in our committee, and I desire to be heard a few minutes upon it.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to state to the House what most members are aware of, that for the last three years the Government has been receiving from two little islands in Behring's Bay, some one hundred and fifty miles from the mainland, and lying contiguous to each other, the sum of $261,000 a year as royalty and rent for the fur-seal fisheries and the use of the islands; a very large revenue from such an apparently unimportant source. It is supposed, from investigations that have been made, that there lie in other parts of Behring's Bay, between Behring's Strait and the Aleutian Islands, other rookeries of the fur-seal, from which additional revenue to the United States may be derived. It is also supposed that the haunts of the sea-otter, one of the most valuable furs known in the world, the skins of which in the market range in value from twenty-five to one hundred dollars each, may be so utilized by a proper management of the sea-otter fisheries, and other furs in that locality, as to bring a considerable revenue to the Government.

There is no station of the United States where officers or soldiers of the Government are employed nearer than Sitka, which is south of the Aleutian Islands. The regions proposed to be explored extend from three hundred to one thousand miles north of that, in a portion of the world where during the summer season the sea and the islands are covered with fogs and mists, where it rains almost continually. They have been heretofore very little explored. The knowledge which has been derived of them by the Russian government heretofore has been confined to the Russian government, and never has been made public so that it might be known. All their operations connected with the fur-trade are kept secret, as is the case at the present day with the Hudson Bay Company of British North America. There have been no officers of the Army, or other officers of the Government, even if fitted for such an investigation, within from three hundred to one thousand miles of the regions to be explored.

This exploration requires an agent familiar with the language of the inhabitants, one ardent and energetic in his desire for exploration, who will have to pass from island to island and examine in that misty, cloudy, rainy region all the haunts of these fur-bearing animals, and report to the Government the information he may collect. This will be a work of toil and danger. The whole exploration, after these islands have been reached, will have to be made in the little skin boats or kyaks of the natives. It is a thankless task in one sense, and yet one which a naturalist and explorer might be very willing to undertake, as the gentleman proposed to be sent there has already undertaken in regard to the seal-islands, Saint Paul and Saint George.

The gentleman who it is proposed shall be appointed to this work, Mr. Elliott, has spent a year and a half among the Aleutian Islands and has made a report, a few copies of which have been printed, setting forth the haunts and habits of the seals upon these islands, the duties of the Government in regard to their protection, and the amount of revenue that may be received. It is a report that is a credit to the country and to him. It is proposed, if he will consent, to employ him for a year or perhaps two years longer in this further exploration.

I have been familiar with this subject since the time the first bill was reported to the House in regard to these seal-fisheries. I took part in the preparation of that bill some years ago. At that time we were receiving nothing in return for the $7,000,000 which the Government had expended in the purchase of Alaska. But from the action which originated in this House we adopted a plan which has given us a revenue of $261,000 a year from two little obscure islands, Saint George and Saint Paul. It is thought this revenue may be increased, perhaps doubled, if the seal-rookeries on the other islands, should there be such, and the other fur-fisheries, are protected as they should be, and other fur-bearing animals are saved from needless destruction or from being driven from their haunts on our territory.

The object of this bill, which has been introduced at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, is to enable him to send one man, not to inaugurate an expensive expedition costing thousands of dollars, but to send one man who shall continue the explorations which he has made so satisfactorily to the Government during the last year and a half. And I trust there will be no objection to this bill in an economical point of view. In my opinion the beneficial results of this measure to the Government and to its revenue will greatly counterbalance any possible expenditure which may be made under the bill.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. CONGER. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BECK. I would like to have the bill read, and then I only want to occupy two or three minutes.

Mr. CONGER. The bill has been read twice.

Mr. BECK. It has not been read this morning.

Mr. CONGER. O, yes; it has.

Mr. BECK. Then, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word on this question.

Mr. CONGER. I will first yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] for three minutes.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to call attention to the provisions of this bill, which has just been explained by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] To start with, it creates a new office. It provides for an additional special agent of the Treasury, at a salary of $2,500 a year and traveling expenses, whatever they may be—probably $2,500 more. It continues this office for two years, making the expense to the Treasury at least $10,000. The object of the bill as stated here—and I have no doubt that such is the sincere purpose of the gentlemen who bring forward the measure—is to see whether we cannot make something out of Alaska. We have found that purchase an expensive one, costing some seven or eight millions in gold; and we have realized but very little out of it thus far. The bill seems to be an experiment based upon this theory: that it is not certain but there may be more seals in that region of country than have yet been discovered, and that a hardy, vigorous, enterprising traveler, at an expenditure of $5,000 a year, may find that there are multitudes of them there, and that he may also be able to hunt up some parties who will be willing to contract with the United States to pay something for the opportunity of killing them and taking their skins. Well, it occurs to me that this is not the wisest economy. Although this bill has the indorsement of two committees—as respectable and honorable committees as any in the House, and composed of as intelligent gentlemen as any others—it seems to me that this is a very singular method of attempting to replenish the Treasury of the United States. The proposition is to send out a special agent—to create a new officer, though we are attempting here on all hands to cut down the number of public offices. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES,] in a speech which he delivered here some weeks since, arrayed with startling significance figures to show how much money we were paying out and how little we were getting in return for it. And yet his committee have indorsed this project to pay out $10,000, more or less, in an effort to see whether we cannot get something back from our expenditure for Alaska. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this measure is certainly not in the direction of economy.

If the bill is intended to hit the case of some traveler who has gone abroad, some special agent of the Treasury Department who has been investigating consulates, or something of that sort, and who is coming back by way of Alaska, (the appropriation on which he is traveling having expired,) that may possibly be a reason with some gentlemen why the bill should be passed. I do not suppose, however, that either of the committees that have recommended this bill had any such missionary in their mind. I have, however, seen an intimation in the newspapers that some gentleman has been appointed as special agent for the purpose of going to Alaska and investigating the fur-seal fisheries.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will the gentleman from Vermont state the name of the person to whom he refers?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I cannot. I think, however, he was from Vermont; and I suppose he is now in San Francisco waiting for this bill to pass, so that he may get $5,000 a year while journeying to and from Alaska. Now, sir, while this bill may be a wise measure of public economy, while it may be the means of getting back into the Treasury more money than we pay out to this officer, it does not seem to me on the face of it to promise very much in that direction.

Mr. BECK rose.

Mr. CONGER. I will yield in a minute to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. Speaker, I think it would hardly be consistent with the good health of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] if any bill, for any purpose, was to pass this House without his occupying our attention with something entirely disconnected from it, such as his reference in this case to agents for investigating consular matters. My friend from Vermont is economical. He shows it every day and every hour by occupying with his economy hour after hour of the time of this House, which is said to cost $5,000 an hour. Now, sir, the gentleman has never voted for economy as I have and as other honorable members of this House have.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The gentleman cannot find anywhere a record which will show that I have not been as economical in all my votes as he has been.

Mr. CONGER. Now the gentleman must interrupt me again, it seems. But this House knows that on every occasion, whether the bill is important or unimportant, whether it looks to economy or to squandering, the gentleman from Vermont rises with his tall, lank form and opposes every measure that comes before the House, whether he knows anything about it or not. My own opinion has been that he took this course in the arduous and laborious pursuit of information, desiring that the progress of the Government be stayed while he gathered for himself a little private information, which he might have learned from the reports of the committees.

Of course there has been a report made on this matter—a printed report, (Elliott's report)—which, if the gentleman had read it, would have shown him the importance of such a bill as this. If he had read even the current record of the country he would have known that Alaska did not cost $8,000,000. There is not a school-boy in the land but knows "seven millions for Alaska" is the great war-cry of the country, and not eight millions, and yet a million is of no difference to my friend, the economical gentleman from Vermont. He said seven or eight millions, he did not know which.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of entire indifference to me whether the House passes this bill or not; but it has been thought by those who do know something about it, those who have spent their time in studying the condition of our country even as far off as Alaska, that there is here an opportunity of recovering from that country at least a fair interest upon the expenditure of the Government, and to put this money into the Treasury at a trifling cost.

Now, why does the gentleman vote here to give forty, fifty, sixty, or seventy thousand dollars in exploring around the Yellowstone in the interest of science? The gentleman voted for that bill, and I was surprised he did, for a bill organizing a great corps of men, surveyors, horses, mules, and cattle, and camp equipage, to explore the beauties of the Yellowstone. He had no word of reproof for that; but it is only when we propose to send some poor, lone, adventurous explorer, without retinue, without horses, without mules, and even without a jackass, that he objects. It is only when we propose to send out this adventurous explorer, who is to go to the region of mist and rain, and darkness and storm, alone, in his poor seal-skin boat, that the gentleman's economy comes to the rescue. And he talks to this House about the enormous expenditure of eight dollars a day for a man who, in the interest of science and in the interest of this Government, will risk his life and peril his comforts to go there alone to make this exploration—a thankless task for anybody.

Now, while I would go with the gentleman from Vermont, who has arrogated to himself not only this year but during all the preceding years ever since I have had the honor of being a member—who arrogates to himself the entire economy and prudence of the whole House as if he alone knew what was best for the Government to do, as if he alone knew where an expenditure would be beneficial—I say while I would go with him in all that is reasonable and in all that is proper, there is a limit to this eternal ringing into our ears of objections to every measure which will promote the prosperity of this Government. The gentleman from Vermont fails to see that, and he will go down to his grave objecting, objecting, objecting. He will go into the other world, and I believe when he gets there will object to the angels treading the golden streets for fear they will wear away some of the golden dust and destroy it forever.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The gentleman should not forget that I am in favor of gold, while he is in favor of greenbacks.

Mr. CONGER. I say, Mr. Speaker, that possibly one of the main inducements held out to my friend from Vermont for seeking to go into those glorious upper regions is that, inasmuch as he is such a lover of gold, he will have these golden streets to walk upon.

Now, sir, this is simply a question for this House to consider, whether or not this trifling expenditure commends itself to the judgment of the House as a desirable one for the interest of the Government. If not, defeat the bill. If it is desirable and proper in the direction of sound economy, pass the bill. I now yield to my other economical friend—my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I knew all the time that the gentleman from Michigan was speaking in reference to the gentleman from Vermont, while looking at me so sternly, it was a warning to me not to say anything against this bill, and was meant as a prelude to what, if I should do so, would surely fall afterward on my devoted head. I will take the warning given by his manner. I have had to make my peace with him once or twice before.

Sir, I sympathize with the gentleman in the object of the bill, but while it was before the Committee on Ways and Means I voted against the special provision limiting it to a single person, and he not an officer of the Government, although a majority of that committee voted in favor of it. I opposed it for this reason: While I have the highest appreciation of the talent of the young gentleman named, (Mr. Elliott,) whose report I have read and to whom I listened with much pleasure before the committee, and while I am prepared to say his work and his learning are everything to satisfy me that he is a young man of uncommon intellect, yet I did not think it was a proper thing for the purpose I had in view to pass a special bill to give him this employment alone. I will state my reasons briefly.

We have a contract now with a great, rich, and powerful company whereby they agree to pay us two dollars per skin for one hundred thousand seals, and the rent for the islands amounts to some fifty or sixty thousand more. We thus receive $200,000 for one hundred thousand seal-skins and from fifty to sixty thousand dollars for the use of the islands.

That company may or may not be taking more than one hundred thousand seals. I believe that nearly three hundred thousand seals are taken from our islands instead of one hundred thousand under that contract. There are houses in England that have a monopoly of the business. Not a seal-skin can be brought into this country—their monopoly is absolute. The skins are shipped from the islands to San Francisco and thence to London; and there they are manufactured. While seal-skins cost them $2.50 apiece, and two good seal-skins make a full set for a lady, or three inferior ones, not costing the company for a set over $5.50 or $7.50, that monopoly enables them to sell those sets of furs at prices varying from seventy-five to one hundred and twenty-five dollars in gold in London, or from two hundred to three hundred dollars a set in New York after they have been returned to this country.

My opinion, from pretty thorough information, is that those men are getting somewhere seal-skins to the amount at least of three hundred thousand a year. That number are said to be in the market, and there is no other place to get them except what fur can be obtained from one Russian island. The company has a general contract with the government of Russia to take as many seal-skins as they please from the Russian possessions, but, as I learn, they get very few. I do not suppose they get ten thousand a year from all the possessions of Russia. But that unlimited contract with Russia enables them to claim that all the seal-skins they have beyond one hundred thousand come from the Russian possessions, when in fact most of them are coming from our islands.

I desire, therefore, to send a man capable of looking into this business, an energetic officer of the Army, a man of high standing and position, responsible to the Government, to investigate those contracts and the number of seals that are taken, so that Congress may know whether we are being defrauded. I have faith in the capacity and integrity of the regular Army officers, and I rely on their disposition and ability to make our information thorough. Why, sir, this young man is no doubt a young man of scientific acquirements, a young man of education, and a young man well qualified to take photographs and write reports about the habits of seals, and I have no reason to doubt his integrity; but I would as soon think of sending a Southdown lamb to the prairies of Texas to catch wolves as of sending him to detect frauds perpetrated by that company. I want an officer of the Army to be sent for that purpose. And while I think the investigations of this gentleman ought to be prosecuted, and his examinations made, and the habits of the fur-seals made known, and that he is a good man to do that work, perhaps the best man in the country, I would add to this bill, even if I intended sending him, a provision for sending also one of your most competent officers and for paying him, if necessary, a fair price for the delicate and difficult services required at his hands.

Let us see that those companies are not defrauding us, that they are not annually taking from us in excess of their contracts hundreds of thousands of seal-skins, as I believe they are now doing. And if, as Mr. Elliott reports, the number of seals that may be killed can be increased and two or three hundred thousand can be killed—indeed he supposes that as many as four hundred thousand may be taken annually without encroaching on the breeding-grounds—why, in that case, let contracts be made on the report of a responsible officer, after a thorough investigation, which would enable us to get what we ought to from these islands and prevent fraud, if there be any, from being perpetrated, if it should be developed, as I believe it would be, that we are now being defrauded.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make one further statement. The Government has an agent on each of these islands, Saint George and Saint Paul. The agents count all the skins there. But one vessel goes from there to San Francisco, where the skins are all counted from off the boat. There can be, without fraud on the part of the officer, no excess in the killing beyond the number that is reported, except a few thousand authorized by law to be killed by the natives for their food. There are five million seals it is supposed that land there for breeding purposes; after that they disappear in the ocean and nothing is known of them for nearly a year. Those agents are local officers. They stay there; while the exploration this bill calls for will extend over a seacoast of seventeen hundred miles, and much more for its bays and inlets.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question in the line of what he has just been saying. Statements have been made in the newspaper press to the effect that the number of seals taken on those islands amounts to two hundred thousand or two hundred and fifty thousand a year. On what authority that statement is made I do not know. But I desire to ask the gentleman whether the Committee on Commerce had given any special attention to that subject, or whether they have relied generally on the provision of law, and supposed that all was correct.

Mr. CONGER. I will say, in answer to the gentleman's question, that the law under which these islands were leased provided that there should be resident Government agents on those islands, who should take account of every seal-skin taken there, the killing of seals being put under their direction. They are shipped on board the only one boat which is allowed to approach those islands and taken to San Francisco. And I desire to say this, that of all the seals taken in the world two-thirds are taken on those two little islands one hundred and fifty miles away from the mainland.

A portion are taken from the Russian islands, on the Asiatic coast; a few are taken occasionally on their passage up and down the coast, taken in the water or upon rocks; a few are taken in the southern seas around the southern pole and from the adjacent islands. That embraces the whole; and I may say that there is in all the world but one place where these fur-seal skins can be prepared for use in the form in which they are used. So far as the taking off the hair from them and cleaning and coloring them is concerned, there is but one firm in the world that does it, and that is a London firm. Thousands of dollars have been expended to find out the secret of preparing and dressing fur-seal skins and coloring them; but as yet the business is confined to one firm.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is a manufacturing secret.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir; it is a secret; no one else has yet found out the particular mode of preparing fur-seal skins for the market, and hence this firm in London can command, and, as the gentleman from Kentucky says, do command, the whole market of the world. They alone buy them for what you might call the manufacture of fur-seal skins.

Mr. MAYNARD. One word more. It was stated in connection with the Russian treaty, how truly I do not know, that the Russians retained one or two islands near to the Asiatic coast, avowedly because they believed that we should manage the seals on the islands of Saint Paul and Saint George so unwisely that they would be driven from there to take refuge on those islands on the Asiatic coast, so that, notwithstanding the treaty, Russia would practically have the benefit of the fur-seal skin trade after all.

Mr. CONGER. We think the protection provided by the present law will preserve this fishery perpetually to our own Government. That was the object of the law, and the only object of making this monopoly, and so far it works admirably. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, the policy of the Government in regard to this matter is fixed by law. It is too late for us to discuss its propriety. When the bill which is now the law was before the House I was intensely opposed to it and had a prepared speech upon it which remained undelivered; I sought the opportunity which my friends on the Committee on Commerce would not let me have to bring before the House the very objections suggested to the operation of this law. But the law passed against the protest of the Treasury Department, and against the protest of many members of this House. I am free to say, however, that the objections to putting this whole matter into the hands of one monopoly for twenty years have not been realized by experience. It has thus far worked well. I have kept my eye upon it, and not a friendly eye either, because I felt that it was wrong. I am willing to say that thus far the interest of these parties has led them to conduct this business remarkably well, as well for their own interest as for the interest of the Government and the preservation of the seals. But the whole thing depends upon the fact whether we know that we have the whole control of the fur-seal fishery or not. We cannot acquire the knowledge of that fact in any other way than by ascertaining more fully than we now are able to tell what is the condition of the other islands still in the possession of Russia. Every man cannot acquire that knowledge. An Army officer of the United States going there among these islands would be repelled; he would have no facilities for acquiring this information. It is proposed by the Treasury Department to send out there a young gentleman who has been a year and a half there, and has acquired by his relations with the people there such facilities as no other man possesses, and which would enable him to bring back to us the topography of those islands, the climate of those islands, to enable us to tell whether it be true, as my friend from Kentucky suggests, that these parties sell two or three hundred thousand skins a year and pay us a tax for one hundred thousand only. I have no reason to believe that they do cheat us; but I said when this bill was passed that they had made a contract with Russia for the other islands and that under cover of that contract such a result might be reached by them. I have no evidence that induces me to believe that such is the case beyond the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky. I see no better way to guard our revenue and to secure facilities in the collection of these taxes than that which is proposed by the Treasury Department, to bring back here, from one who will have facilities for obtaining this information, such a report as he has brought back in reference to our own islands, and the like of which for value of information has never been brought us from those regions.

Sir, not only are there seventeen hundred miles of coast there; there are more than four times that extent of coast there, taking all the islands into consideration. Then there are other kinds of fishery; there is the fossil-ivory business; and there are other fur-bearing animals on the mainland of which we are almost entirely ignorant, and concerning which we can obtain information only from the inhabitants of those islands through persons so situated that they can obtain reliable information I know that a man may go there and play and pretend to get information. And I know that one who is an enthusiast in his business, who has devoted himself summer and winter to exploring that icy region of country, who has become identified to some extent with the interests of the inhabitants themselves, if an honest and faithful man, can bring back information which no other man can obtain. An Army officer, honest I have no doubt as they all are, but bound up in his formalities and regimentals, under orders of cast iron, and stiff as those which govern all Army explorations, would come back here with reports formal enough, but the information to be derived from them would not be very great.

When this whole matter was before the Government when the treaty with Russia was pending, the Government found but one man in the country who knew anything about the condition of these islands. He was an old sea captain down in New Bedford, in my State, who had spent nearly thirty years in the Pacific Ocean and among these islands. They brought him on here, and the information which he gave to those who negotiated that treaty, and to the Treasury Department afterward, was the basis of all the legislation we have had on this subject. He has been sent there, has spent the whole of his time there, summer and winter, coming back here once each year to make his report and to make such suggestions as to the management of these islands as his experience and observation enable him to make. It is in this way and this alone that we have been able to take care of this Russian acquisition of ours and to make it pay something into the Treasury.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say one word before the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] takes his seat.

Mr. DAWES. The floor is in the control of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. I am advised that I must call the previous question now, if I wish to have this bill acted upon this morning.

Mr. BECK. I merely wish to say a word or two to put myself right.

Mr. CONGER. I only wish to obtain action upon the bill and not have it lose its place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to call the previous question.

Mr. BECK. I do not mean to say that I knew this was all a fraud. But my information while in London last summer was that there was a very large number, perhaps three hundred thousand, seal-skins, used annually there; and I do not believe they came from any other source.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I understood him to say that the only person who had any knowledge of these seal-islands was an old New Bedford whaler.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps I ought not to have said that he was the only man.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I wish to say that Henry Havens, of New London, and H. & S. Willett, of New York, sent their whaling ships to these islands some seven years ago, took possession of them by force, and formed a seal-hunting company, which with their old ships and oil-pots they sold out for millions of dollars. Stockholders of that company, with few exceptions, are foreigners, persons in Hamburg, Frankfort, and London. That is the way this seal-skin company was formed.

Mr. DAWES. I do not want to discuss that question. But years back of that Captain Bryant——

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. He never was heard of in this speculation. This is one of the most gigantic speculations of the age. It is talked of in every city of Europe; it is well known there that this seal-skin fraud, as it is called, has been legalized by Congress and has now become one of the most gigantic swindles of the age. And they charge for a seal-skin suit, which costs them perhaps from fifteen to twenty dollars, from one hundred and seventy to two hundred dollars.

Mr. DAWES. I am speaking of the knowledge we obtained.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I did not intend to say a word on this subject, but I know that Henry Havens, of New London, and A. & S. Willett, of New York, started this seal-skin company that has made so much money on the Pacific coast.

Mr. CONGER. I now call the previous question.

Mr. COBURN. I wish to propose an amendment to this bill, to the effect that the Secretary of War shall be authorized to detail an officer of the Army to go with this person and in conjunction with him make inquiries and report; and that in addition to that he shall also inquire and report whether the contracts as to the seal-fisheries have been heretofore complied with and whether said contracts should be extended.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will suggest that the Secretary of the Navy should send a naval officer.

Mr. CONGER. I must resume the floor, and call the previous question.

Mr. COBURN. I desire that this amendment may be read for information.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot yield.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 74, noes 65; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CONGER and Mr. BECK were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 81, noes 66.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was, Shall the main question be now put?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] might be read. The object is to get the amendment attached to the bill if possible, and I ask that it be read for the information of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot yield; it relates to an entirely different object.

Mr. COBURN. If the gentleman will hear it read he will see that it relates to this very subject.

Mr. CONGER. It relates to an entirely different object. I cannot yield to have it read.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays upon the main question; and there were 35 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 102, nays 110, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Averill, Barber, Barry, Bass, Bradley, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. So the main question was not ordered.

During the roll-call, the following announcements were made:

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish to announce that my colleague, Mr. WILLIB, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. YOUNG. If he were present, he would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The House having refused to order the main question, and the regular order being called for, this bill goes over. But the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] is recognized to offer an amendment.

Mr. COBURN. I move to amend the bill by adding the following:

That the Secretary of the Navy be, and is hereby, authorized to detail an officer of the Navy to go in connection with the person above mentioned, who shall be charged with the same duties, and shall make a like report upon the subjects therein named, and shall also report whether the contracts as to seal-fisheries have been complied with by the persons or company now in possession, and whether said contracts can be safely extended.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the previous question may be considered as ordered on the bill and amendment.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, and the House having refused to order the main question, the bill must go over, as the currency bill has been made a special order for half-past one o'clock.

Mr. CONGER. When will the bill come up again?

The SPEAKER. To-morrow morning; or if the currency bill should be disposed of to-day, it would come up immediately thereafter.

REMOVAL OF OBSTRUCTIONS AT HELL GATE.

Mr. MELLISH, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the East Side, West Side, and North Side Associations of the city of New York, to the Congress of the United States, in favor of increased appropriations for the removal of obstructions at Hell Gate; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The memorial of the East Side, the West Side, and the North Side Associations of the city of New York, in favor of increased appropriations for the removal of obstructions at Hell Gate.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The associations above named respectfully ask your honorable bodies to make suitable appropriations for the removal of obstructions impeding the navigation of the East River entrance to New York Harbor, and present the following facts as reasons to warrant an early completion of that work:

1. The East River is an arm of the sea through which passes a large portion of the vast fleet of coasting vessels that trade from the Eastern States to New York; and it is the hourly resort of steamboats crowded with passengers, and carrying the most precious freights.

2. The removal of those obstructions involves the expenditure of a sum trifling in comparison with the amount of property daily placed in jeopardy. From records kept at Execution Height it appears that from August 1 to November 30, 1868, inclusive, (four months,) 19,408 vessels passed that station and through the Gate. Of these there were 2,434 steamers, averaging at least 1,200 tons, and 16,974 sailing-vessels, (including 8 ships, 22 barks, and 436 brigs,) averaging at least 150 tons each, a value in tonnage alone of more than $700,000,000, or more than $6,000,000 daily passing that point. Add to this the vast amount of freight moved by steam and by sail daily through this channel, and there is given an aggregate of many millions of dollars daily exposed to the perils of this passage.

3. The number of passengers on the various steamers during those four months averaged 7,212 daily, and including the crews of steamers and sailing-vessels, there were over 12,000 souls daily exposed to consequences which were chiefly averted by the skill and watchfulness of pilots.

4. From investigations of several years it appears that an annual loss of over $1,500,000 has arisen from these obstructions. Admiral Davis has written:

"Of sailing-vessels which enter the Hell Gate passage, it is estimated that one in fifty sustains more or less injury by being forced by violence of the currents on the rocks and shoals."

And Admiral Porter has written:

"No one can form an idea of the number of vessels that go on shore during the course of a month. Fifty went on shore during the period I was occupied there, (two months,) and many of them were much injured."

5. The appropriations made by Congress for the removal of these obstructions began in 1868, when an appropriation of $80,000 was made. Since then the following appropriations have been made: In 1869, $180,000; in 1870, $250,000; in 1871, $250,000; in 1872, $225,000; and in 1873, $225,000. These appropriations, however, included expenditures for the whole distance from Buttermilk Channel, at Governor's Island, to a point beyond Hallet's Point, above Astoria, and only about 60 per cent. of the same has been expended in the Hell Gate improvement. The appropriations made have been inadequate to carry on the work with the success desired, as appears by all the reports made by General Newton, who is in charge of the work. In his last report, dated August 20, 1873, he writes:

"We have been much delayed, and the cost of the operations has been increased, by being compelled to work under appropriations not sufficient for rapid and economical progress. These matters have been touched upon in previous reports, and I repeat them here simply from a sense of duty."

In fact, in consequence of the exhaustion of the appropriation made at the last session of Congress, work has been actually suspended at Hell Gate since the 20th of November.

At the rate of progress thus far made it is estimated it will take from thirteen to sixteen years to complete the work, whereas with adequate appropriations it could be completed in three to four years.

In conclusion, it is hardly necessary to say that the commercial interests of our whole country, and a just regard for the lives and property of its citizens, as well as ordinary business economy, require that this work should be completed at the earliest possible period.

In view, therefore, of the importance of the subject and the absolute necessity that larger appropriations should be made, the said associations ask an appropriation for that object of at least $600,000 for the current year, that amount being required to enable all the men to be employed that can be worked to advantage.

Respectfully,

CHARLES CRARY,
WILLIAM A. DARLING,
THOMAS J. CROMBIE,
Special Committee of Public Meeting called by the East Side Association.

A. R. MARTIN,
JOHN W. PIRSSON,
LYNN S. CLARK,
L. G. MORRIS,
Special Committee of the West Side Association.

W. T. MARION,

IRON-SHIP BUILDING-YARD.

Mr. HAYS, by unanimous consent, presented from the Committee on Naval Affairs a report to accompany the bill (H. R. No. 589) to establish an iron-ship building-yard on the waters of the Atlantic and on the Mississippi or one of its tributaries, and to afford facilities to the Navy; which was recommitted, and ordered to be printed.

HOMESTEAD AND PRE-EMPTION SETTLEMENT IN CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the bill (H. R. No. 2298) to restore certain land in California to homestead and pre-emption settlement; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

TELEGRAPH LINE FROM SANTA FÉ TO TUCSON.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to a telegraph line from Santa Fé, New Mexico, to Tucson, Arizona Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CURRENCY AND FREE BANKING.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. NILES] is entitled to the floor.

[Mr. NILES addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.] At the conclusion of his speech he said: If I have any time remaining, I yield it to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I shall be very much obliged if the House will allow me twenty minutes; that is, seventeen in addition to the three minutes yielded to me by the gentlemen from Mississippi, [Mr. NILES.]

Mr. RANDALL. That is not an unreasonable request; I hope it will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it is said "the people look too much to the Government for relief." Under ordinary circumstances, and in a government well administered, the people should only ask it to protect them in their rights of persons and property, and leave them to work out their own destiny and happiness as to them should seem proper.

But, sir, the Congress of the United States has taken upon itself the management of the affairs of the people in so far as to provide them with a circulating medium, and by unfriendly legislation taken from them the right through their several State governments to provide it for themselves.

When a crisis comes upon the country like that under which we have been suffering since September last; when business in all departments is prostrate; when the laboring man cannot get bread for his family; when the industrious mechanic cannot get paid for his work; when the agricultural interest of the country is languishing for the want of means with which to prosecute it; when the people of two great sections—the West and the South—are disheartened and borne down with oppression, resulting from the laws of the United States, is it not natural and proper that the people should look to the source of their evils to have them corrected?

The Congress of the United States by its banking system and its laws of unequal taxation has brought the country to its present condition of distress. And the people will look to it to furnish some remedy for the great wrongs under which they are suffering. It is idle for Congress to attempt to escape the responsibility. It rests on them, and them alone, and there the country will place it.

Congress is the author of the banking system, which enabled all the banks of the United States at one time to close their vaults on the people's money, and in defiance of right, justice, or fair dealing to hold it and laugh their depositors to scorn, while they use the money to gamble in stocks and for other purposes to promote their own interest. And Congress sits with folded arms and looks serenely upon the wreck which itself has produced. The country, well knowing the financial system is the creature of Congress, looked with anxious interest for its meeting in December last, with the confident hope something would be done for the relief of the people.

The session is passing away, the spring season has come, when the farming and all other business interests must know what they are to rely upon, yet Congress does nothing. The banks hold with clenched hand the currency of the country from its rightful uses, make millions at the expense of the people, issue their certified checks or "their promises to pay," while the people in every department of business outside of New England and the East, in consequence, are prostrate and overwhelmed.

Sir, will not the Representatives of the people rise to the magnitude of the crisis and apply the remedy? I venture to answer for them, they will do nothing equal to the great emergency, but will talk and resolve, and resolve and talk, until the end of the session, without passing any law which will give substantial relief. Some paliative may be offered to an outraged people. And they must wait, as we are told, "for the laws of trade to regulate the affairs of the country."

Sir, if this state of things had been produced "by the laws of trade," I would join them in the sentiment. But as it was not the laws of trade, but the laws of Congress, which produced the convulsion, it therefore becomes the first and highest duty of Congress to apply the remedy and correct the evil. Will you do it? If the people of the great West and the South could answer this question, they would say in no doubtful voice you must do it.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are told that there is a sufficient amount of circulation to meet the wants of the country. This question is difficult to determine by any system of calculation. We must, therefore, look to the amount now in circulation in other countries, as well as in our own, before the present state of things existed, to act with wisdom on this great question.

ENGLAND.

Total circulation	$772,684,000
Population	31,817,108
Amount of circulation to each person	$24.28

FRANCE.

Total circulation	$1,250,000,000
Population	36,802,921
Amount of money to each person	$34.62

GERMANY.

Total amount in circulation	$1,091,000,000
Population	41,058,196
Amount of circulation	$26.60

UNITED STATES.

Total amount in circulation	$669,000,000
Amount of circulation to each person	$16.72

SOUTHERN STATES.

In 1861-'62, bank circulation	$71,098,408
In 1873, bank circulation	$38,160,308

VIRGINIA.

In 1860, bank circulation	$19,817,148
Bank circulation to each person	$12.41
In 1873, bank circulation	$3,902 342
Amount of circulation to each person	$3.25

Thus, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that while in England, France, and Germany the average circulation per capita is $28.50, in the United States it is only $16.72, and in Virginia only $3.25 for each person, a difference in favor of those countries over ours of nearly 100 per cent.; and over my own State of nearly 900 per cent.

But, sir, this is not all or the worst. Great wrong and injustice exist in the unequal distribution of the bank circulation. The facts and figures which I give will startle gentlemen who have not examined this question.

The five New England States have of bank circulation	$110,489,966
The five Middle States have	124,608,139
Total in the ten States East	235,098,105
The fifteen Southern States and the District of Columbia have only	$38,160,308
The twenty Western and Pacific States and Territories all combined have only	78,709,836
Total in the twenty-seven States South and West, and the Territories.	116,870,144

These figures are taken from the official report of the Comptroller of the Currency. They make the shocking exhibit that little New England has three times as much circulation as all the fifteen Southern States, and about 35 per cent. more than all the Western and Pacific States and the Territories combined.

It is not the laws of trade that takes all this money to New England, but the laws of Congress inaugurating this system of banking which builds up the moneyed monopolies of New England at the expense of the farming and laboring classes of the South and the West. Unjust as the law is, still it has not been fairly executed as to the South and West, as I will now proceed to show.

The following table exhibits the apportionment of the whole amount of circulation authorized by law ($354,000,000) to the different States upon the basis of population and wealth as given in the census returns of 1870, together with the amount outstanding and authorized, and the excess and deficiency:

It will be seen from this table that New England is entitled to $39,799,920 and that it has $110,489,936—an excess of $70,690,046; almost three times as much as it is entitled to. The South is entitled to $89,249,211, and only has $38,160,308—a deficiency of $51,271,034, and not half as much as is due. All must be impressed with the fact that the above table shows that every New England and Middle State has an excess, and every Southern and Western State a deficiency, of bank circulation.

Mr. Speaker, does the history of any government furnish a parallel for such inequality and injustice as the foregoing figures show? Why is this? The answer is easy.

New England has had the wisdom to keep in office her trained and able statesmen. New England presides over this House in the person of the distinguished and popular Speaker. New England has the oldest member on this floor, [Mr. DAWES,] who is chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. New England has the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. BUTLER.] New England has the chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, [Mr. POLAND.] New England presides over the Senate of the United States. New England had the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BOUTWELL, and has the present incumbent, Mr. Richardson.

New England, owing to the experience and ability of its members has given character to the legislation of this country for a number of years, which has all been in their favor and against the South and West. It has been in the interest of monopolies, oppressive to the the farming, mechanical, and all industrial interests of the South and West.

Wise administration of government would protect the people against money and monopolies. The latter are always able to take care of themselves. They need no protection at the hands of the Government, but the people need protection from their encroachments. The most detestable of all despotisms is the despotism of money.

The monarch knows that the perpetuation of his family depends largely upon the content of his people, and that to be contented they must be comparatively prosperous. His constant study, therefore, is to so conduct financial affairs that money shall be cheap and labor remunerative. Money knows no law but one of extortion; and whether its demands be wrung from the blood of the people, or filched from the contending factions of the rich, its merciless thirst for more is never quenched. Always on the alert for victims, the blood-stained battle-field is its paradise, and the moaning of the widow and the fatherless its consolation. It needs no protection. Yet the Government has reversed its duty, and instead of legislating for the people, and in their interest, it has legislated for capital and concentrated wealth; for railroads with watered stocks, who charge the people for transportation double the cost of construction; for organized rings to reduce the value of the products of the farmer; for stock-jobbers and gamblers who speculate on the miseries of the people.

By this system of protecting capital the East has over two-thirds of the entire bank circulation; own a large majority of the bonded debts of the States of the South and West and the counties of the West which issued bonds for railroad purposes. There is scarcely a county in the great State of Illinois which is not greatly in debt by bonds issued for railroads. Those bonds followed the money of the country, which being in the East found a market there, and the people of Illinois are not only paying to the eastern capitalist the interest on those bonds, but, with the people of the South, are paying to the national banks of the East 6 per cent. interest in gold on their United States bonds to the amount of $235,000,000.

Well may the East, with one foot on the South, the other on the West, with one hand in the pocket of the South and the other in the pocket of the West, intrench themselves behind their money-bags, the bonds of Western States and counties, and their iron vaults, and exclaim "We want no more money." Well they may, sir, when they have two-thirds of all the money of the country and a mortgage upon the lands of both the other sections. More currency would enable the people to raise these mortgages and pay their debts without having their land sold under the marshal's hammer, and save their wives and children from being turned out of home to buffet the peltings of "the pitiless storm," dependent upon the support of a cold and uncharitable world. This, perchance, might render the money and stocks of the East less valuable to them; hence they oppose an increase of the currency, let the consequences be what they may to others.

Patent and glaring as is the injustice which I have pointed out, still more so will it appear in another aspect which I shall now present. I will, for illustration, run a parallel between my own State (Virginia) and New England:

Internal-revenue tax of New England:
Maine	$214,696 73
New Hampshire	325,455 36
Vermont	75,860 40
Massachusetts	3,761,004 95
Rhode Island	324,552 17
Connecticut	873,984 99
Total tax	5,575,554 60
Internal-revenue tax of Virginia	7,343,799 29
Thus Virginia pays in excess of all New England	1,778,244 69
Amount of bank circulation in New England	110,489,966 00
Amount in Virginia	3,902,342 00
Difference in favor of New England	106,587,624 00
Amount to which New England is entitled	39,799,920 00
Amount to which Virginia is entitled	8,031,242 00

New England has nearly three times as much currency as the law prescribes, and Virginia not half as much as is due her under the apportionment law. Virginia has to pay the General Government in revenue $7,343,799, and has only $3,902,342 circulation with which to pay it, while all the New England States only pay $5,575,554, and have over $110,000,000 with which to pay it. Virginia pays tax: United States, $7,343,799; State, school, and county tax, $4,485,088; total, $11,829,887; her whole circulation being about one-fourth of the annual taxes she is required to pay.

Is this right; is it just; is it fair? Do gentlemen expect Virginia to remain quiet under such unjust and oppressive legislation as this? No, sir; if she can do no more she will at least through her Representatives enter her protest at the bar of this House, and thus publish to the world the oppressions, the wrongs, and injuries inflicted upon her by the legislation of her own country. Stripped by the war of every vestige of personal property, her territory unlawfully severed, her buildings, her timber, her fencing committed to the flames, she will have paid to the General Government after this year a sum sufficient to have discharged her own State debt—about $50,000,000—on which she is unable to pay the interest; still this Government exacts the uttermost farthing, and leaves her people and her creditors to suffer the consequences. Virginia, though poor, bends not "the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift may follow fawning." She asks no alms, "no touch of pity;" she only demands justice, her rights under the Constitution, and "equal protection under the law." If these had been granted her the State debt would have been adjusted, and her people would now be marching on with steady step and buoyant heart to prosperity and happiness.

Sir, Virginia is the fifth tax-paying State in the Union. Most of this tax is unconstitutional because it is a tax on the products of her soil. It is as unconstitutional to tax tobacco as it is to tax cotton or any other agricultural product.

Mr. Speaker, let us examine for a moment the bill under consideration. It is not a bill for the benefit and relief of the people, but an amendment of an existing law. This brings us to the point of examination of the original banking system of which this is an amendment. Of all the schemes projected by capitalists while the country was at their mercy, the banking system is the most nefarious and indefensible.

Already had protection and exemption of a large portion of our wealth drifted the profits of legitimate pursuits toward centralizing influences, and made their holders and owners the recipients of the tolls exacted by the laws against the people. Not satisfied with these discriminations in favor of capital and against labor, it was demanded that the enormous gains proceeding from these systems should be provided for by submitting the control of the finances to a banking system that in its operations has not only destroyed private, but has as well threatened the public credit; that has diverted the control of public affairs from the representatives of the people and the other co-ordinate branches of the Government to the capitalist and the bankers; has made the whole machinery of the Government the instrument of money, to do its bidding and accomplish its ends, each day by its operations making its authority more absolute and its extortions more grievous.

Let us strip this so-called blessing to its native nakedness. In the first place, capitalists, either by association or alone, procure from the Secretary of the Treasury authority to establish a national bank with an issue of, say, $450,000. To secure that issue it is required under the law to deposit $500,000 of Government securities, upon which the Government of the United States pays 6 per cent. interest semi-annually in gold. Thus for $500,000 of securities he receives first 6 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually in gold, and $450,000 of the circulating medium guaranteed by the Government, without interest, to loan to the people at rates governed by the locality in which the bank is established, and 6 per cent. in gold directly from the pockets of the people as interest upon the public debt.

Mr. Speaker, let us try it by another statement of its operations. A man comes to the city of Washington with $100,000 in Government securities which at present market rates, cost him $113,000. He takes back with him $90,000 of national-bank notes, which he loans to the people, and draws $6,000 in gold of the money of the people, on an investment of $23,000 in greenbacks; thus making the people in the short period of four years pay back to him every dollar of investment, and in all after time, without one dollar advanced, making him a pensioner on the people to the tune of $6,000 in gold per annum on every $90,000 of issue of his bank.

Let us apply this to the present condition of affairs. There is assumed to be $350,000,000 of national-bank issue; the average of which will put the whole in circulation for more than four years, adding 10 per cent. to which gives the amount of bonds in the Treasury for the security of the circulation, $374,000,000; 6 per cent. on which shows the startling fact that the people of this country are paying a stipend of $22,400,000 in gold annually to these crippled and wounded bankers, whose portentous front and fear-inspiring battle-cries scared rebellion to its kennel. Every dollar they have invested has been returned to them, and yet the country, its wood-choppers and its blacksmiths, its farmers and its merchants, its mechanics of all grades, and its professions, are called upon to vindicate their loyalty to the country and their appreciation of the vast services performed by these heroes for all time; to pay them a bonus of $22,400,000 in gold, and that semi-annually.

Let us, Mr. Speaker, consider the operation of this system from another stand-point. I lay it down as an undeniable proposition that one of the highest duties of a government is to make money cheap to the people, for upon the labor of the people it is dependent for its greatness and prosperity. Let us apply this test to this war and capital begotten scheme.

It will not, I believe, be denied that the average rate of bankers' loans exceeds 10 per cent. per annum. The Government pays on the whole sum deposited as security 6 per cent. interest in gold, which, taking the five years last past, has equaled 7 per cent. in currency, making the aggregate rate of interest of this financial policy of the Government against the people 17 per cent. per annum, a rate denounced as usurious and unlawful by almost every civilized nation on earth; a rate which no people can carry and prosper; that rapidly centralizes the money in the few and makes poor the many.

Nor is this all. The national banks give occupation to three hundred and fifty millions of our circulation, taking it out of fair competition with our other moneyed wealth, thus tending to raise the rate of interest on the whole circulation, and through the special privileges granted are enabled to usurp control of our finances, establish fictitious values, and ruinous policies.

I undertake to say that there can be no parallel found in the world for our present system of finance. The other moneyed wealth of the country in private hands is being lent to the people at from 6 to 10 per cent., while the Government, one of whose highest duties is to make money cheap, guarantees to a vast and overshadowing money combination near double that rate.

Mr. Speaker, the apologists and advocates of the national banking system claim that it affords more security for the circulation and more protection for the depositor than any system that could be devised. That the circulation is secure has been vindicated by its appreciation in value during the late crash. That appreciation, however, was not attributable to any inherent virtue in national banks, but because the Government was pledged for the redemption of the issue, and because the people of the United States have full faith in our ability to pay, and the genius of our people will compel strict conformity to their obligations.

But what is the necessity for establishing this combination of middle-men between the Government and the people, who plunder them from one channel alone of nearly $25,000,000 currency annually?

To show that the people have full faith in the issue of the Government without security, except its written promise to pay, there are nearly $400,000,000 of what are known as legal-tenders issued direct from the Treasury to the people, and which do not cost them one cent of interest, and which circulation stands superior to the circulation of the national banks. Then why not make our whole circulation legal-tenders by paying the bonds deposited for security of the national-bank circulation; thus saving this $25,000,000 currency annually, and giving to the people a cheap, abundant, uniform, and stable currency, at the same time discharging the public debt and placing in lieu of it a non-interest-bearing circulation?

This system would enable the Government to dispense with the enormous and unjust internal tax.

But, sir, it is said that it affords more protection to the depositor than any other that could be adopted. Let us investigate upon what grounds, if any, this assertion rests, and let us test its truth by the light of recent events.

So long as an unhealthy condition of finance prevails, in addition to the 10 per cent. margin of securities deposited in excess of issue, just so long will there be an additional security afforded by the discrimination between gold and Government issue, which difference in value I shall attempt to show proceeds solely from the manipulations of the consolidated capital of the national banks. If a healthy state of the finances were possible under the present system, 10 per cent. of the securities deposited stand for the protection of the depositor. The stockholders are responsible for double the amount subscribed. In the country districts, where banks are organized largely for the benefit of legitimate business, protection is afforded the depositor to a limited amount. It is shown by recent experience that the stockholders of the country banks become themselves the victims of the system.

The rule applicable to country banks, which control but a small portion of the money assets, has no application to city banks. Recent experience has shown practically, what it has been the effort of philosophical minds to show, that consolidation and centralization of money can only result in ruin to the country oppressed by it. Its advocates proceed upon the fundamental error that to make a financial system secure there must be consolidation of money interest.

The Government by the national banks provided a speedy channel of communication with the money centers. At certain periods, when the demand for money in the agricultural districts was light, through this channel it gravitated toward the centers, and money there became redundant. With redundant money speculation in wild-cat schemes to make it productive was the inevitable result. The surplus of the farmers of the Southwest, derived from the sale of tobacco, cotton, and other agricultural products, deposited with their local banks, was by them in many instances shipped from the country to the metropolitan banks; and by them loaned to the stock broker and gambler on Wall street. The security for the loans were largely stocks that were without value, or whose values were so influenced by redundant money in the great centers, provided by this system, that the failure of a single bank crushed the rotten structure to the earth, and the country banks so investing, represented as they are by responsible stockholders, are compelled to pay, as far as the law provides, their depositors for money sent by them to the money centers to be swallowed up in stock-gambling.

It was my intention to elaborately argue the propositions involved in this discussion, but I am warned my time is about exhausted, and I shall withhold for a future occasion what further I intended to advance.

It has been my effort, Mr. Speaker, to show that all legislation for internal revenue looks to the protection of the capitalist and the consequent destruction of the prosperity of the producer—is in the interest of money which has no intrinsic value, and against labor which is the sole foundation of wealth.

It has been my effort to show that the national banking system has centralized the money of the country in the cities, and that distribution of its circulation has by unfair discrimination depleted and impoverished the South and West and enriched and made despotic the New England States and the great commercial centers, and that the only remedy is to repeal all legislation that looks to the protection of money; that legal-tenders be substituted for national-bank currency in amounts sufficient to meet public demands, and that all unfair discrimination against labor and the products of the soil be abandoned.

I regret my time has expired, and return my thanks to the House for their kind attention.

Mr. BURCHARD addressed the House; but before concluding his remarks,

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HAVENS in the chair.) The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] has expired.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, and Mr. RANDALL addressed the Chair.

Mr. BURCHARD. I hope I will be allowed a few minutes more.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the time of the gentleman will be extended.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BURCHARD. I think fifteen minutes will be enough.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I believe it was arranged that I should have the floor after the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] had concluded his remarks.

Mr. RANDALL. My understanding was somewhat different. It was that I, as a member of the committee reporting this bill, should have the floor for one hour, and with that understanding I have arranged to give all but five minutes of my hour to four other members of the House. I am entirely willing that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] should address the House now, provided the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON,] who is to speak first in my time, will consent thereto, and for that purpose I will ask the gentleman from Virginia how much time he wants?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I am obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] for his courtesy. I will get through as soon as I can. As I have not a written speech, it will be somewhat difficult for me to tell now how long I shall require. I wish to say that the arrangement indicated by the gentleman will be satisfactory to me. There will be at least half an hour left for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] when I have concluded my remarks. And allow me to suggest that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] being a member of the committee, has this advantage over me; if I go over to-day I may not be able to secure another chance to address the House, whereas he can obtain the floor at any time. I hope I will be permitted to follow the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD,] that being the arrangement for a long time, as the list on the Speaker's table will show.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be no objection to the gentleman from Illinois continuing his remarks.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Illinois continues his remarks it will make it the worse for my hour.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I must object to any extension of time being given until this matter is decided. If the floor is assigned to me, then I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois to proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] being a member of the committee, is entitled to the floor if he claims it.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Virginia will say that he will proceed now, and speak until ten minutes after four, and then let the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] occupy the floor for the rest of the day, I will consent to that. I think that is a fair proposition.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. And I am to get what further time from the House I can.

Mr. RANDALL. That is for the gentleman to determine.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I must take my chance for that.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I must apologize for my persistency in trying to obtain the floor at this time according to the arrangement which was made after consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. MAYNARD.] I believe it is unfair to me, as a member of this House, who have the same right as other gentlemen, to have a gentleman, whose name is to be found on the list away down below my name, to come in and take me from the floor now. For that reason I do what I have never done before since I have been a member of Congress, insist upon taking the floor at the time it was understood I should have it. I submit that it is no worse for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] that he proceed at the termination of my remarks, than it is for me to wait and permit him to proceed now. As I applied for the floor weeks before he did I think I am entitled to it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am sorry that the "chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency" has been brought into this matter; he had no authority over it. The gentleman spoke to the chairman, to be sure, and he recognized the courtesy which has always been extended by the Chair to members of the committee who have reported a measure of general importance. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is the only member of the committee who has not spoken.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not complain of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] He has acted very properly in this matter.

Mr. MAYNARD. I stated to the gentleman here at my desk that the arrangement would be satisfactory to me.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] be allowed to finish his speech; and meanwhile the gentlemen can arrange this matter among themselves.

Mr. RANDALL. I have been trying to do that; but it requires the patience of a saint.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. We have arranged it once, if gentlemen would abide by the arrangement which was made. That is the difficulty.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] indicates that ten minutes will suffice to enable him to finish his remarks.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Very well; I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] to proceed for ten minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURCHARD. Mr. Speaker, there is no subject agitating the public mind of greater or more absorbing interest than the one presented by this bill. Every producer in the nation is concerned in our legislation. Every disturbance of values and increase or diminution of the purchasing power of money is felt in every part of the continent. A change in the standard of value is a change in the nominal amount of thirty billions of national wealth and ten billions of annual productions, and many billions of debts and credits.

These considerations forbid hasty and precipitate action. But delay has been severely censured. It is asserted that business is paralyzed, that channels of trade are obstructed, the wheels of industry motionless and markets overstocked, and that enterprise is checked and commerce is idle. This is charged by some to result from insufficiency of the currency, by others from failure to establish or adhere to a settled policy, and the uncertainty in regard to congressional legislation.

The bill under consideration is a proposition to permit bankers to place themselves voluntarily under the provisions of the currency act, offering the inducement of the advantages of the name and the right to issue notes as circulation. This is the main scope and effect of the bill. The subject opens up a wide field for inquiry and discussion. Hardly any two Representatives or business men entertain similar views. Among the ablest financiers there is the widest diversity, both as to the evils of the present system and the remedies to be applied. Gentlemen who have preceded me in the debate within the last two or three days have presented, it seems to me, clearly the distinctions, the proper definitions and principles in regard to the functions of money and the measure of value. I shall content myself with a brief reference to that branch of the subject.

OFFICE OF MONEY.

Money performs important and distinct offices. It is used as a common measure of values, a means for facilitating exchanges, and as actual wealth in possession. These three uses of money, namely, as capital, means of exchange, and measure of values, often lead to confusion.

Exchanges made upon credit, such as charges upon the tradesman's books, make use of money only as a measure of value. It is not actually used to facilitate an exchange or as capital.

A merchant who has charged a customer ten dollars for goods sold and delivered has used no money to facilitate exchange. No circulation or currency has been required. By a credit equal in amount for services performed, or other goods received, no currency ever may be required. The account may be settled without the necessity of a dollar to facilitate the hundreds of exchanges made and consummated.

Each charge and transaction, each credit given and balanced, necessitates reference to a measure of value, although none is actually employed.

A measure must be portable, divisible, uniform, and have qualities belonging to that which is measured. The measure of distance must have length; of space, must have dimension; of weight, must have weight; of time, must be an interval of time; of value, must have value.

That the precious metals answer this purpose better than any other substance became evident to mankind at the dawn of civilization. Their use as money marked the first advance from barbarism. With the recognition of the right of separate property followed the desire and necessity for exchange of ownership and of a medium and a measure of value when some general equivalent for the article exchanged became necessary.

It has been well said:

> Gold, silver, and copper possess certain properties which mark them out to be the cosmopolitan currency; it is not caprice frozen into convention, or the stamp of the mint, that has gained for them their present place; and Turgot says well, "Gold and silver are constituted, by the nature of things, money, and universal money, independently of all convention and law." They contain much value in small bulk; they are similar in quality wherever they are produced; they are indestructible; they are readily divisible, and yet do not suffer in beauty by division; and they are readily united. They are so scattered over the globe that the same expenditure of labor has, in the past at all events, generally produced about the same amount of metal, and being at once the most generally diffused and the rarest of metals, they are marked out by nature for coinage.

It is a very common fallacy that the mint gives the value to coin. It is said "The Government makes and stamps the specie dollar, and therefore gives the coined metal the dollar value. Why can it not stamp paper or other material and give it the dollar value?" The mint does not give the value. The Government but certifies the weight and fineness and gives the name. The exchangeable value of an ounce of gold-dust, a bar of gold, or the mint eagle, depends upon the relative quantity of pure gold it contains. The Government has evidently given no value, unless the added cost of coinage. The value of precious metals, like that of other things, is measured by the demand and cost of production. A promise to pay coin, though not itself capital, represents capital and an actual, tangible, divisible portion of the wealth of the country.

We are presented with the practical question, of what shall the currency, the circulating medium of the country, consist? No gentleman on this floor proposes at this time to return to an immediate resumption of specie payments. I have heard of no gentleman, and I do not know there is one in the land, who advocates a pure and exclusive metallic currency.

It seems to be admitted that it is for the interest of commerce and for the interest of business that the currency of the country should be mixed—that it should be paper and metallic circulation; at least that is the generally accepted opinion. There are, however, gentlemen here who insist that coin can be entirely dispensed with; that it is unnecessary there should be a metallic basis or a metallic measure of value.

STAMPED PAPER MONEY.

It has been proposed to dispense with coin as a measure of value. It is said, "Base your money not upon precious metals, part of the wealth of the country, but upon its whole wealth. Stamp upon paper 'United States, one dollar;' declare that it shall be a legal tender in payment of debts and be receivable for all taxes and dues of every kind." To the student of history and economic science the proposition seems too absurd to attempt a serious discussion of its effect. Great commercial nations having paper substitutes for coin have postponed or dispensed with their redemption, and have declared by legal enactment the bare promise or paper token equally valuable with coin bearing the same name and denomination. They have forbidden discrimination between them. It has been made a crime to refuse the paper or give a premium for the coin. Such offenses have not only been threatened but punished with fine, imprisonment, and even death. Yet it has been found impossible in any country, although often attempted, to prevent the depreciation of the government irredeemable paper money. The history of continental money, the paper currency of the United States, and the confederate money of the South during the rebellion are familiar illustrations:

All the devices I have seen, all the schemes proposed to dispense with coin and use paper tokens, are but modified imitations of various substitutes of the theories of the grand schemer who originated over one hundred and fifty years ago the great Mississippi Company, and plunged France into such a wild and frenzied state of speculation and involved its people in such wide-spread commercial disaster. One of the most earnest, and perhaps the ablest, advocates of the theory, was the celebrated John Law, whose work on that subject, printed in 1705, nearly one hundred and seventy years ago, I hold in my hand. In this treatise, published in Edinborough, he endeavored to impress the idea upon the Scotch Parliament and upon the Scotch people. He told them they might dispense with coin, and that its place could be taken by paper—by a cheaper and better currency.

I will read what he said of his scheme:

> I will attempt to prove that there can be established another money, having all the qualities necessary for money in a higher degree than gold, containing other qualities that gold lacks, and preferable for use even if gold were a production of Scotland; that by means of this money the people will be employed, land cultivated, manufactures encouraged, foreign and domestic commerce sustained, and wealth and power established upon a solid foundation.

That theory is not new. It is amusing to see gentlemen struggling to be acknowledged as the authors of the theory and its earliest advocates here. Gentlemen, too, claim that it is their invention, and that they are entitled to the credit of having brought forth the idea as the production of their own brains. But, Mr. Speaker, that theory, that idea, goes back two hundred years at least. John Law promulgated this very doctrine—that gold and silver are but a part of the wealth of the country, variable in quantity, liable to exportation, unserviceable for currency, and unequal to a paper circulation based upon the credit of the nation, or the value of its lands or other property. In this memorial to the Scotch Parliament he advocated the issue of paper tokens in quantity limited only by the demand, based upon land or its rental as a measure of its value, and receivable in payment of taxes or debts in place of coin.

Unable to impress careful Scotch financiers and legislators with his scheme, he ultimately presented his views to the regent of France, whose empty treasury and past expenditure furnished an inviting field for an adventurer of Law's genius and fascinating address. The regent listened eagerly to the wonderful schemes for producing untold wealth, and Law was made comptroller-general of the finances of the country.

The Bank of France was established, and at first—each livre based upon and representing a gold livre of the realm—its notes not only were as good but better than gold—they commanded a premium. But this safe and prudent course was soon departed from, and unlimited amount of bank-notes was not only permitted but issued. The depreciation of the excessive volume of paper was remedied by debasing the coin. The paper livre, worth but half the coin livre, was made as valuable by making the livre of half the amount of gold. But these efforts were futile.

It is unnecessary, however, Mr. Speaker, that I should dwell for any length of time upon the evil results and misery which were entailed upon France in consequence of the adoption of the theory of John Law.

INTERCONVERTIBLE PAPER CURRENCY.

But this idea of convertible currency—a currency which is never to be realized—where both principal and interest are to be payable in paper; it is like the offer made to the Saviour. It offers the holder all the kingdoms of the earth, of which it has not a foot in possession. It is a paper title never to ripen into enjoyment; shares upon which dividends are to be paid only in additional shares.

The gold-bonded debt is to be changed to this paper. Eighteen hundred million dollars are to be made payable only in paper, and to draw interest in paper. If such paper rests upon the solid wealth of the country, it rests upon it as the ocean lies upon the solid earth. He who sails upon this delusive sea to take possession of the patrimony promised finds no dry land to rest upon. The paper billows are between him and his inheritance. Like the ancient mariner, he finds water—water everywhere.

But, Mr. Speaker, others have largely gone over that branch of the subject. I wish to say, as between bank-note circulation and United States note circulation, if there were no limitation by act of Congress, it would be a mere question of cost to the nation.

FAITH OF THE NATION PLEDGED.

But, as has been most ably argued I think, and to which I have failed yet to hear any answer, the faith of the nation has been solemnly pledged, if an act of Congress can make that pledge, that the volume of the paper circulation shall never exceed $400,000,000. We said it when we needed money to carry on the war. We at first said there may be a temporary excess of $50,000,000, but after the $50,000,000 were retired we again said there should never be more than $400,000,000. As the chairman of the committee [Mr. MAYNARD] suggests, that $50,000,000 was permitted only for a definite, specific purpose, which was fully accomplished, and its reissue was never authorized. Then, subsequently, we said there should be four hundred millions of legal-tender circulation. Now, then, with that limit, if the business of the country requires more than $400,000,000 and more legal-tenders cannot be issued, banks must be permitted to supply additional needed currency, either under national auspices or through State-bank organizations.

I think the country is satisfied that the national-bank organization is better than State-bank organizations.

I have always doubted the power and questioned the necessity under which the Secretary of the Treasury has seen fit to issue, since September, twenty-six millions of additional United States notes. The power of Congress itself to declare and make such notes a legal-tender for payment of debts was denied by a majority of the judges of the Supreme Court and has never yet been affirmed by the court to exist in time of peace.

POWER TO MAKE PAPER LEGAL TENDER.

It was at first denied absolutely. In 1869 the Supreme Court held, by a majority of five to three, in the case of Hepburn vs. Griswold—

We are obliged to conclude that an act making mere promises to pay dollars a legal tender in payment of debts previously contracted is not a means appropriate, plainly adapted, really calculated, to carry into effect any express power vested in Congress; that such an act is inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution, and that it is prohibited by the Constitution.

It was but an iteration of the opinion of Daniel Webster, the greatest constitutional lawyer and statesman this country ever produced, how in the Senate in 1837 said:

Most unquestionably there is no legal tender and there can be no legal tender in this country under the authority of this Government or any other but gold and silver, either the coinage of our own mints or foreign coins, at rates regulated by Congress. This is a constitutional principle perfectly plain and of the highest importance. The States are expressly prohibited from making anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts; and although no such express prohibition is applied to Congress, yet as Congress has no power granted to it in this respect but to coin money and regulate the value of foreign coins, it clearly has no power to substitute paper or anything else for coin as a tender in payment of debts and in discharge of contracts.

Subsequently, in the case reported in 12 Wallace, a majority of the court reversed the previous decision and sustained the legal-tender quality of these notes; but the court has not yet passed upon the question as to the power to make Treasury notes a legal tender in payment of debts in time of peace when no public exigency exists requiring the exercise of such power to preserve the Government. Upon that question we have the opinion of Mr. Spalding, of New York, member of the Committee on Ways and Means, who introduced the bill into Congress from the committee.

In speaking of this law, he said:

Introducing the legal-tender bill early in January, 1862, immediately after the suspension of specie payments, in this great crisis I advocated the bill as a war measure, a measure of temporary relief to the Treasury, and on the ground that it was an imperative necessity to preserve the life of the nation. I conceded that it was a forced loan, and could only be justified on grounds of necessity. As a war measure, passed during war, continuing during the war, and as long as the exigency lasted, I believe it was necessary and proper to successfully carry on the war, and was therefore constitutional. I am equally clear that as a peace measure it is unconstitutional. No one would now think of passing a legal-tender act making the promises of the Government (a mere form of credit) a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private. Such a law, passed while the Government is on a peace footing, could not be sustained for one moment.

Two of the five judges constituting the majority sustaining the legal-tender clause of the law have indicated in their opinions the distinction between the power to issue legal-tenders in time of war and in time of peace. Justice Miller, who maintained in Hepburn vs. Griswold that these notes are a legal tender for pre-existing debts, said:

The legal-tender clauses of the statutes under consideration were placed emphatically, by those who enacted them, upon their necessity to the further borrowing of money and maintaining the Army and Navy.

Justice Bradley, another of the five judges who decided the law constitutional, said:

The power to make Treasury notes a legal tender, while a mere incidental one to that of issuing the notes themselves, and to one of the forms of borrowing money, is nevertheless a power not to be resorted to except on extraordinary and pressing occasions, such as war or other public exigencies of great gravity and importance; and should be no longer exerted than all the circumstances of the case demand.

If Congress has such power, and is the sole judge of the necessity and propriety and of the times and modes in which it shall exercise powers confided to it for a particular emergency, constitutional liberty and the safeguards and limitations of the Constitution are worthless and at the caprice of popular and changing opinions. Although doubting the propriety or wisdom of issuing these notes, yet, as they are in circulation, I am unwilling to vote to take them up without some provision for supplying other circulation in their place. Indeed, their retirement at this time is impractical.

The exigencies of the Treasury have called them out. The Treasury has no surplus with which to redeem and retire them. I therefore voted against making the amount of the legal-tender circulation $356,000,000. There is no reason in keeping just that figure, and when the Treasury is in condition to redeem legal tenders either in coin or with redeemable notes in their place I see no propriety in saying that just $356,000,000 should be the limit.

On the other hand the four hundred millions is an actual authorization of increase of United States notes; a designed expansion of United States notes without any plan for their conversion or redemption. The increase of a depreciated irredeemable paper currency unavoidably results in a further depreciation. It has been the experience of every age. Every nation making the experiment has bitterly learned this lesson. During the rebellion it was not so much want of confidence by the people in the success and ultimate triumph of the Union cause, as the volume of the debt—the swelling volume of paper promises. When the war was over the legal-tenders still remained depreciated.

The Confederate States vainly attempted to make their money equal to gold. They made it a felony to discriminate between specie and confederate currency. Its refusal was declared by law to cancel a debt equally with its receipt and payment. But it was still refused. The more rigorous the law, the more severe its enforcement, the more rapidly its value fell.

VIOLATION OF FAITH.

The issue of more United States legal-tender notes without providing for their convertibility into coin at some early, practicable period violates the pledges made by Congress and the nation.

Thomas Jefferson laid down a maxim for the management of national finances that accords with sound statesmanship and national honesty. He says:

It is a wise rule, and should be fundamental in a government disposed to cherish its credit, and at the same time to restrain the use of it within the limits of its faculties, never to borrow a dollar without laying a tax in the same instant for paying the interest annually, and the principal within a given term; and to consider that tax as pledged to the creditors on the public faith. On such a pledge as this, sacredly observed, a government may always command, on a reasonable interest, all the lendable money of its citizens.

It is another of the ringing utterances of the author of the Declaration of Independence. In pursuance of this policy in the very act of February 25, 1862, first authorizing legal-tender notes, it was enacted that the coin received for dues on imports should be set apart as a special fund and applied—

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Secondly. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

Thirdly. The residue thereof to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

In the act authorizing the issue of legal tenders in 1864 the quantity was expressly limited to $400,000,000, and the sum of $50,000,000 temporarily required. The language of the act making the limit is as follows:

Nor shall the total amount of United States notes issued, or to be issued, ever exceed $400,000,000, and such additional sum, not exceeding $50,000,000, as may be temporarily required for the redemption of temporary loan.

After the $50,000,000 had been withdrawn, Congress declared by act that the amount should never exceed $400,000,000. Whatever question there is as to the right to issue that amount, we are most solemnly pledged that it shall not exceed that sum.

When Congress met five years ago, upon the inauguration of General Grant, it gave this pledge to the world. It said:

And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision, at the earliest practicable period, for the redemption of United States notes in coin.

The republican party had triumphantly elected its candidate upon the pledge it had presented in its platform. Five years have passed away, and the national pledge is yet unfulfilled. We have neither made provision for the redemption of the legal-tender note nor attempted to devise any practical method by which it can be done. Worse than that, we have neither stayed the issue of United States notes at three hundred and fifty-six millions, where it stood in 1868, nor checked the Secretary when, under doubtful authority, he had increased it to three hundred and eighty-two millions. We have turned our faces from the coin redemption of the legal-tender currency promises in 1869 and let loose eighteen millions more to water and depreciate that already outstanding, and postponed indefinitely the day of ultimate redemption.

What good will or can this accomplish? Already gold, which before Monday, March 23, stood at 111¼, has risen to 113⅜. The purchasing power of the seven hundred millions paper currency is to-day eighteen millions less.

The nominal value of all the wealth of the nation was estimated by the Census Bureau in 1870 at $30,000,000,000, and of the millions of debts and credits probably as much more. Values have been unsettled by our legislation. The fifteen dollars weekly wages of the mechanic is worth thirty cents less, and the price of clothing and supplies and commodities must ultimately advance with the advance of gold, which is and remains the real standard of value.

VOLUME REQUIRED.

There are various circumstances that affect the amount of circulation demanded to accomplish the exchanges of the country. The habits of the people, their confidence or distrust, the facilities for using more convenient substitutes, enlarge or diminish circulation.

A stable government and honorable business community will inspire confidence. The trader gives credit to integrity and industry. While dishonesty must pay cash, the responsible, punctual purchaser's note is accepted in place of gold. Our people feel that the government of their choice is the safest in the world. Contrast this stability for the last hundred years with that of France from Louis XIV to Napoleon III, of the commune and the French republic. Such convulsions as France has witnessed shake confidence, lessen credits, and increase the demand for actual cash in the business of the country. A greater per capita coin circulation is accordingly to be expected in France than in England, the United States, or in other stable government. The amount of circulation required will depend upon the frequency and amount of exchanges; and the latter will greatly depend upon the amount of wealth to be exchanged as well as upon the production, habits, business, and number of its people.

Now the wealth of the United States is not over half that of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The estimated wealth of Great Britain and Ireland is $47,000,000,000; and our own, being estimated at $30,000,000,000 in our paper currency does not exceed half that amount. Then Great Britain is one of the greatest commercial nations of the world. Her exchanges must exceed ours. So in France. The wealth of France is estimated at double that of the United States, being, according to Monsieur Bernard in the Journal des Economistes of March, 1871, 300,000,000,000 francs, ($60,000,000,000,) while the census of 1870 gives the United States $30,000,000,000. In comparing the circulation of France with that of the United States it must be recollected that no deduction is made for coin or notes held in any other banks than the Bank of France, while in the United States the amount of cash in the two thousand national banks is shown by their returns, and in most estimates deducted from the circulation.

(a) The data necessary to a complete statement of the coin and notes in circulation in Germany at a recent date are not attainable. The figures given in this column refer only to the North German Confederation, and the date selected is one that preceded the formation of the German Empire.

(b) The figures for the United Kingdom and Germany include coin alone. The bullion in the Bank of England, amounting to about £16,000,000, or $77,760,000, is omitted both from the grand total and from the metallic reserve of the banks. The bullion in the German banks is estimated at $7,909,968, their total metallic reserve, at the time in question having been $107,909,968. In the case of France, bullion is included both in the bank reserves and in the figures giving the total metallic currency of the country.

(c) The figures referring to France include bullion. Those for the United Kingdom and Germany do not.

(d) The gross annual value of property and profits assessed to income tax in the United Kingdom, in 1871, was £465,594,366; which being capitalized at 5 per cent. and reduced to dollars, gives $45,255,772,375.20, which, at the usual rate of increase, must have been augmented by the end of 1873 to about the sum given in the table. (See Statistical Abstract of the United Kingdom for the years 1858–'72.) The wealth of France is given as estimated by T. N. Benard, on page 139 of the Journal des Economistes for May, 1871. Owing to the payment of the indemnity to Germany, and the large extent to which the industrial energies of the country have been absorbed in the reorganization of the army, it is not likely that the wealth of France has materially increased during the past two years.

Then, again, it is not taken into account in those estimates that one million of the people of this country to-day are using coin as their medium of exchange; and all the estimates I have seen made of the amount of money in circulation in the country exclude the idea that our people are using coin; whereas it is used not only in the West and in some portions of the South, but it is used to facilitate exchanges to the amount of over $1,000,000,000 in our commercial transactions with foreign countries. I only call attention to those criticisms because I shall not have time to enlarge upon them. I ask the attention of gentlemen to the estimates and table furnished me by the Bureau of Statistics, except as to the United States, which I present to show the comparison between the wealth and the paper and total circulation of our own country and that of foreign nations.

But there are two practical questions, the decision of which is based upon actual facts, that I desire at this time to discuss. One of these is the quantity of circulating medium in the country and in other countries as compared with our own; and the other, the panic of 1873, the causes and circumstances that produced it, and particularly the question, Was that panic caused by a preceding contraction of the currency?

CURRENCY IN THIS AND OTHER COUNTRIES.

I have taken the pains to ascertain as accurately as possible, at least for myself, through the officers of the Government, the amount of actual circulation at the present time in the country and since the year 1834; and I particularly call the attention of the House to the per capita circulation in the years 1834–'37–'43–'57–'61, and at the present time. (See tabular statement on next page.)

I call attention also to the amount of coin and paper money in circulation, commencing prior to 1837, down to the present time. The estimates from 1834 to 1870 are taken from a table I prepared and presented in the Forty-first Congress, showing the amount in the country in each year by adding to the quantity of the preceding year the annual production of our mines, the specie imported and assumed per capita brought by emigrants of twenty dollars each, and from the same deducting the specie exported and annual loss by destruction in the arts. Continuing the same estimates to the present time the amount of specie in the country in January, 1874, would be $143,000,000. This coincides with the estimate of nearly every statistician and every financial author, being roughly stated as $140,000,000.

The amount of bank-notes and other paper money was ascertained from reports made from time to time to the Secretary of the Treasury by the banks from accounts kept in the Secretary's office.

Gentlemen have argued that there has been a great contraction of the circulation; that there is much less circulation in this country now than heretofore, and than that of foreign nations. The gentleman who just preceded me spoke of the circulation of France and of Germany and of England, and compared the per capita, as he made the amounts in those countries with the per capita in this country at the present time. Some comparisons give larger estimated per capita for those countries than the Bureau of Statistics shows really exists. There are also considerations that should be taken into account in comparing the circulation of those countries with ours. Circulation is not needed merely for population. The people who are engaged in the primitive industries, fishing and hunting, need but very little circulation and use but very little.

PANIC OF 1873.

Mr. Speaker, there are two theories in regard to the cause of the commercial crisis and panic of 1873. One ascribes it to an insufficiency of money to do the business of the country, resulting from the contraction of the circulation. The other asserts that the condition of the currency produced the panic; that its excess and depreciation were the original exciting cause. Upon this subject various gentlemen have addressed the House. Their arguments, when analyzed, amount to this: during the panic currency was wanted; it was not to be had; in 1865 and 1866 there was nearly three hundred millions of currency more than in 1873; there has been contraction, and contraction brought on the panic. My first answer is that there has been no contraction of the currency within the last five years; the only contraction that was made in the currency was made within the first three and a half years. Secondly, panics result from undue expansion of loans by bankers and unprofitable investments of the savings of the nation.

The total amount of currency in circulation, as reported to me this morning by the Treasury Department, including the 3 per cent. certificates and the national-bank circulation, all the paper that is authorized to be issued as money, and not including the seven-thirties, which some gentlemen include in the amount in 1865 and which would make the amount much greater, was in 1865 $945,000,000. In 1869 the amount of paper circulation was $743,000,000, and on December 31, 1873, the amount was $776,000,000, being an expansion of the paper circulation at this time above what existed in 1869; so that there has been actually an expansion of the currency since 1869 and within the last two years.

There are some circumstances which tend to require less currency at the present time than was needed in 1869. What are the causes which lessen the necessity for the use of currency, either of paper or coin? First, an increase of banks; and that is one reason why I am in favor of this bill as a whole. I find that the private banks in the country have increased since 1869, as shown by returns to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, from 2,500 to 4,200. In Illinois we had in 1869 134 private banks, and in 1873 we had 314. In 1869 our deposits in those private banks were only $7,000,000, and were last June over $33,000,000. The increase has been remarkable.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue furnishes me the following:

Increased facilities for doing business diminish the amount of circulation required to transact business. Such facilities have increased in the United States faster than wealth or population. Among these are the means and rapidity of transportation and communication to different parts of the United States. Where men have frequent and easy communication the amount of currency required to perform their business is greatly reduced. The same dollar bill will pay a dozen different debts in the city to one in the country. Railroads and telegraphs practically bring men closer together. Time and space are annihilated. The money remittances pass with greater rapidity as increased facilities are extended. The express and the fast-freight train push into new regions, following the new railroad lines. Even the postal accommodations are increased, and lessen the amount of currency. Let me call attention to the increase in telegraphs and postal and railroad facilities since 1869. These accommodations, with increase of number of banks in the country, make the United States like one great city.

In 1869 payments and remittances were oftener made with money itself. The number of private banks has increased from twenty-five hundred to over four thousand; the national banks from sixteen hundred to two thousand. The mails, the railroad passenger-trains, and even the express companies, send the bank check or draft where formerly cash was used to make purchases or pay debts. The capital and deposits of private banks and bankers have increased since July 1869, to July, 1872, as estimated from taxes paid by them, as follows:

Capital	$89, 014, 200	$195, 211, 400	$106, 197, 200
Deposits	346, 883, 400	728, 650, 200	381, 766, 800

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue furnishes me the following information:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, March 28, 1874.

SIR: In further reply to your inquiries relative to capital and deposits held by persons, bank associations, companies, or corporations, other than national banks, engaged in the business of banking, I have to submit the following statement, showing the amount of such capital and deposits taxable under the internal-revenue laws held, during the years 1869 and 1872, as follows:

Capital held in 1869	$89,014,200
Capital held in 1872	195,211,400
Deposits in 1869	346,883,400
Deposits in 1872	728,650,200

Total average amount of deposits held during June, 1873, including deposits exempted from tax, $1,229,094,594.

Very respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS,
Commissioner.

Hon. HORATIO C. BURCHARD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Organization of new banks diminishes the amount of currency demanded to do the business of the country. Checks take the place of coin and notes.

Mr. Buell, the president of the Importers and Traders' Bank of New York, says, in his statement made February 9, 1874, before the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Mr. BUELL. The proportion of currency to checks, bills of exchange, &c., used in commerce, is so small that few people conceive of it. We use in New York about 5 per cent. currency. In smaller towns they use 10 per cent.; in still smaller places from 15 to 25; and when you get back to the agricultural districts, it requires 50 per cent. or more. The other 95 per cent. of the commercial transactions of New York City are moved by checks, bills of exchange, &c.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the 5 per cent. cover the shopping and money transactions, hotel bills, &c.?

Mr. BUELL. Yes; it all comes to a point in the banks through the clearing-house exchanges. Take your own experience, or that of a merchant who pays $50,000 by checks in a day, and not more than $100 for cash disbursements, personal expenses, &c.

NATIONAL TAXATION HAS DIMINISHED.

The receipts from internal revenue, which were $309,226,813.42 in 1866, decreased in 1869 to $158,356,460.88, and to $113,729,314 in 1873.

The Treasury receipts from 1865 to 1873 were as follows:

WAS THE PANIC CAUSED BY CONTRACTION?

It has been represented, and actually believed, that the contraction of the circulating medium of the country has prostrated business and precipitated on us the panic of last summer. Gentlemen are constantly repeating the amount of contraction since 1865.

It is a mistake that this made a great money stringency and caused the panic of 1873. Facts fail to prove their conclusion. The contraction took place prior to 1869. There has been no contraction of the currency during the last five years; on the contrary, it has been slightly expanded.

A comparison of the amount of circulation in the country at the present time and the amount in the summer of 1869 will show a greater amount of paper in circulation to-day than at that time. The contraction is sought to be shown by comparing the present amount of currency with the amount in circulation in 1865 and 1866. To make the difference more glaring, the compound-interest notes, and seven-thirty notes, and other interest-bearing obligations made legal tender are included as part of the paper circulation in 1865, although really held as investments rather than currency, and owned or kept as special deposits uncounted by the banks by hundreds of millions.

The difficulty in making out a case is apparent from the necessity of going back eight years for a comparison.

The following, originating perhaps in some irresponsible journal, has had indorsers on this floor and is in circulation, supposed to be reliable:

Amount of currency in 1865	$928,240,703
Amount of currency in 1873	767,072,919
Amount of contraction	161,778,784
Add the seven-thirties	829,725,000
Total contraction	1,018,167,784

The Treasurer of the United States, on pages 327 to 329 of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1873, officially states the amount and kind of currency outstanding at the close of each fiscal year, and summaries them as follows:

Outstanding June 30, 1873	401,527,267 94

Congress in February, 1868, passed an act forbidding the retiring and canceling of more legal-tender notes. Since June, 1869, there has been no contraction by the Government of this currency, but an actual increase of from $391,649,558 to $401,527,267—about $10,000,000.

If contraction produced the panic, how slowly its effect developed! It is refreshing to read the glowing descriptions given in 1870 in this Hall upon the then prosperous condition of the country. While this contraction had been going on at the rate of $45,000,000 a year for four years, or $250,000,000 if the seven-thirties are to be counted as circulation—all but $1,168,000 had been redeemed in 1869—the country had been prospering as never before.

PANICS.

There have been three great commercial crises in this country. Prominent above every other business convulsion or financial disturbance, that of 1837, twenty years later in 1857, and that of 1873, through which we have just emerged, and whose effects we still to some extent feel. A recurrence to the events immediately preceding and subsequent to the former crises cannot but aid in regard to the causes which produced those great convulsions and the measures to be adopted to prevent their evils. It is essential that the mere accidental circumstances, common to the periods, should be separated and distinguished from those which produce the changes. What relation had the currency to those panics?

Commercial panics are associated with banks. An extraordinary rush of depositors on the banks, demanding payment of amounts to their credit, is called a panic. It supposes a banker and a depositor. No intelligent analysis of the causes which produce panics without keeping in mind the nature of banking.

WHAT IS A BANK?

The real nature and office of a bank is far different from what is popularly supposed. It is a common idea that the bank is an institution simply for holding money, its own or that of other people. The creditor of the bank whose claims are payable on demand regards and treats his credit as cash, and every other depositor does the same. The bank is supposed to be the depository containing cash to the amount of all the deposits. But this is neither actually true nor is it essential to banking that any money should be used in the transactions in which banking is concerned.

The business of banking is receiving resources from one set of men and transferring them to another. It is the transfer of debts. It is a transfer only. The means transferred may be money, but in actual banking a very small per cent. of money is thus transferred.

The Bankers' Almanac, of 1874, page 239, gives the total of exchanges and cash balances paid for twenty years, and the cash balances have been only about 4 per cent.

The average daily exchanges for the year ending September, 1873, were $111,022,370; and the total exchanges for the same period were $33,972,773,942. The average daily cash balances were $3,765,921, being a little over 3½ per cent. So that the daily use of an average sum of less than $4,000,000 has effected exchanges during the year nine thousand times the amount, and more than the amount of the estimated value of the wealth of the nation. Ninety-seven per cent. of the business of the city banks consists in the transfer of credits, lending the representative of capital received from one customer, called the depositor, to another customer called the borrower.

The $944,000,000 loans reported in September as resources by the national banks consisted of $638,000,000 of resources received from or credited to depositors, to be returned upon demand.

Professor Bonamy Price, who was justly quoted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] as the highest authority on banking, states most graphically the cause and course of a commercial panic. He says in a late lecture:

The mischief commences with the destruction of capital; its investment in unproductive enterprises. Laborers are fed, tools and clothing are worn out, materials are made away with, and no return of new wealth created to repair the loss. Presently the fatal fact is discovered, goods advanced on credit are reclaimed; but the wealth has departed and has not returned in a new form; debts are not repaid, but characteristic symptoms of a bankers' panic come to light. The truth suddenly flashes on commercial minds that mean to pay debts; the economic truth is perceived that wealth has been destroyed and not replaced by new-made goods, but it is seen that the wherewithal does not exist; debtors are driven to throw their merchandise on a market at ruinous prices. Then comes the terrible feeling, Who is safe? Who has gone beyond his means? What great houses have launched over on the sea of speculation and are sound at the core?

In examining each of the periods of 1837, 1857, and 1873, it will be seen that there had been for several years a large increase in importations. In the year ending September 30, 1830, the imports were $70,876,920; in 1833, over $108,000,000; in 1836, about $190,000,000, being $52,000,000 above the exportations of that year.

The fiscal year ending September 30, 1837, the exportations were $141,000,000, being $24,000,000 in excess of the imports.

The imports did not again reach that figure but once until the close of the year 1847, when they amounted to about $141,000,000. This again gradually rose to $315,000,000 in 1836, and $361,000,000 in 1857.

The same increase in imports preceded the panic of 1873. The total imports rose from $462,000,000 in 1870, to $664,000,000 in 1873.

The total volume and per capita circulation of the currency was largely increased in the same periods.

There is another remarkable similarity between these periods preceding a panic. It was not lack of currency in 1837 nor 1857. It was, in the language the Democratic Review of 1838, page 397—

The enormous system of overtrading into which both banks and individuals throughout the United States were embarked had involved almost every one engaged in the active pursuits of life. The improvident accommodations granted by many of our banks were only surpassed in extravagance by the absurd manner in which a great portion of these loans were invested. Suddenly unlimited confidence unhealthily swollen gave place to universal distrust. * * * The aver age price of cotton here rose from thirteen cents in 1834 to sixteen and one-half in 1835, and "to eighteen per pound in 1836." There were vast sales of public lands and excessive importations of foreign commodities.

The historian of the panic of 1873 can now write—

It was the turn in the high prices of 1872, as it was in the high prices in 1836, that brought on the collapse of speculation, the closing period, the stoppage of credit, the demand for immediate payment. In each period there was a large expansion of loans, showing an extension of credits, a spending of borrowed resources.

The story of 1837, 1857, and 1873 is the same.

Commercial crises of 1837, 1857, and 1873 compared.

We find that there was not only a large increase of imports, but also, preceding the crisis of 1857 and 1873, large investments were made in railroads, increasing the number of miles built a year from 1,360 to 3,633. The expenditure for this purpose preceding 1856 was about $100,000,000, and in 1873 it had risen to over 7,000 miles a year, involving an investment of about $200,000,000 a year in railroad building, and some of them unprofitable roads. There was preceding all these crises an inflation of the currency, an excess of currency in the country, and an increase in this speculation and investment of money. There was also preceding them an investment of money in unprofitable enterprises. Prior to 1837 the investment was in lands, which rose from 3,000,000 acres purchased in 1831, to 24,000,000 acres purchased in 1837, and which rose in 1856 to $11,000,000 from $1,500,000 in 1852.

Mr. MAYNARD. We were then on a specie basis.

Mr. BURCHARD. Certainly we were on a specie basis, but the circulation of the country was inflated, and an excess of currency, even of a good currency, will produce overspeculation. My point is this: not that this irredeemable currency necessarily produces panics, but that commercial crises are not caused by an insufficiency of circulation in the country; that there are other causes which produce them, and that contraction could not account for it; for there has been no contraction for the last five years, and in 1869 and 1870 there was contraction by the retirement of the seven-thirty bonds.

Mr. BIERY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. BURCHARD. If I can have my time extended, I have no objection.

Mr. BIERY. Were not the seven-thirties convertible on demand into currency; and, if so, were they not converted, and did they not furnish a part of the currency?

Mr. BURCHARD. I do not dispute that gentlemen are right when they say that the currency was contracted, but here is the point I make: This contraction was ended five years before the panic occurred; why did not the panic come on in 1869 or 1870, when we had contraction, instead of five years later, when there has been within the last year or two an expansion of the currency?

Mr. BIERY. I understood the gentleman to exclude the seven-thirties from the currency.

Mr. BURCHARD. We had in 1869 retired nearly all the seven-thirties.

Mr. BIERY. Did not their redemption lend an influence to the panic?

Mr. BURCHARD. If so it must have been very remote, for it took a long time to make itself felt; it took five years to produce that effect.

Mr. MERRIAM. Has the increase of business and of population anything to do with the actual contraction of the currency?

Mr. BURCHARD. Increase of population would decrease the per capita amount of circulation in the country undoubtedly; but it would not be more than one or two dollars per capita, and that was no be offset to some extent, if not wholly, by other causes. The establishment in a community of a bank dispenses with the use of money, not to recapitulate what I have said and what others have often said. I do not claim that there has been any great difference since 1869, but that there was no contraction between 1869 and 1873.

But I want to say a word or two in regard to this bill, which I will say I favor in the main. Although I am opposed to an expansion of the currency not looking to its ultimate redemption and convertibility, I am in favor of removing the monopoly principle from the banking system. I do not anticipate for the West and South the benefits that are claimed; I will frankly say so. But if the private banks that I have spoken of in Illinois desire to avail themselves of the advantages, if there are any, in issuing national bank-note circulation they ought to be permitted to receive it in Illinois as other States have received it. I do not believe it will amount to very much, if any, inflation under this bill.

The object of those who ask for more currency has been stated by one of the ablest advocates as follows:

No one is here, Mr. President, asking the Government to set in motion her presses to grind out an unlimited quantity of "irredeemable paper." No one is here asking for an issue of currency which is not well secured, and by a gold bond backing it at that. The simple question in substance is this: Shall we increase to a moderate degree the present bank currency under the present banking law, especially in those States which have not received their proportion according to wealth and population?

To that proposition I heartily assent. The right to their just proportion of bank circulation should be accorded to every State.

I favor the removal of the restrictions on banking. Make it free to every part of the country where the securities can be advanced. Let the Government see to the performance of its own undertakings, and leave business and the wants and abilities of communities to fix the measure of circulation.

There are some features of the bill that I heartily approve. But, as I have said, I do not think it will afford the advantages to the South and the West that are expected from it. It will not increase the amount of existing loanable capital in the West. But circulation based upon bonds allows capital to be loaned twice. It has already been loaned to the Government. The bond represents the debt, and is the promise to repay the capital loaned with interest. Upon that, as security, the Government authorizes its creditor to loan, not the capital which the Government owes, but his credit, and promise of payment. The utilization of bonds as a basis of banking gives additional power to the Government creditor to accommodate the private borrower. Thus banking in the West, so far as it uses the bonds held by its own people, increases the power of capitalists to accommodate the local demands of borrowers.

But if the bonds must be bought by the sale of products or with United States notes by the western banker, the local circulation and the power to accommodate borrowers are actually diminished.

Suppose the business men of a town start a national bank. If they have Government bonds to the amount of $100,000 they receive $90,000 in notes, of which they can again loan as money $76,500. If there are no bonds owned in the town, they must be bought. They must collect and send away $115,000 of United States notes, or property which will sell for $115,000 of notes. The power of the capitalists of the town to accommodate borrowers will be diminished from $115,000 to $76,500, being about one-third less. Free banking would not increase local circulation or amount of capital to be loaned in a community unless bonds are actually held and used by the capitalists for banking. But a bank aids the community. It multiplies the substitutes for currency. It increases deposits and makes the check do the business of the note or coin. If the issue of circulation will be profitable, foreign capital will be invited to the locality for investment in banking. This will be a gain in loanable capital in the locality. More borrowers can be accommodated. The interest must be paid to the foreign capitalists, whether the loans are made through the bank or the borrower deals directly with the capitalist. If borrowers make wise use of the capital obtained, and the resulting product is more valuable than the principal and use paid, the community is enriched; if unprofitably employed, the locality is impoverished.

Will banks be organized under the act? Certainly, if the circulation will increase the banker's profits, and if capital is to be had. As I have shown, the banks now existing as private banks in the Western and Southern States have already or can obtain the capital. Will they take the circulation? Their action will be determined by the result of this inquiry. What greater return will a given sum of money expended in buying bonds and obtaining circulation yield than without doing so; that is, if they have not the bonds, as I think they have not to a large extent, in the South and West?

One hundred and fifteen thousand dollars will buy $100,000 of 5 per cent. bonds. Upon that $90,000 of circulation can be obtained, of which this bill will permit 95 per cent. to be loaned, amounting to $85,000, giving—

Interest at 10 per cent.		$8,500
United States tax on capital, ½ per cent. on $15,000 excess, not in United States bonds	$75
United States tax on circulation, 1 per cent.	450
Local taxes increased 1 per cent.	1,150
		6,875
Add interest on bonds, at 112 premium on gold		5,560
		12,435
The loan of capital would have yielded		11,500
Gain		935

Thus there would be realized $935 over and above what would be realized if the amount was loaned directly without organizing as a national bank.

But it is to be taken into consideration that in ten or fifteen years, when these bonds are to be redeemed, the legal-tender notes may be on a par with them and with coin; so that $115,000 put into banking now would yield, when the bonds are redeemed, only $100,000. Thus there is a sinking of $15,000. Under this calculation there would be an absolute loss. For this reason some men whom I personally know could have gone into banking in Illinois refused to do so because they said they could do better with their capital.

Now, make the exhibit for an Eastern State. Where they can loan money at 6 per cent., if the banker has the bonds already, and wants to get circulation upon them, he can clear $3,455 on every $115,000. It will be the interest of the banker in the East to take the circulation if he has the bonds to that extent. Computing the same depreciation of $1,000 on the investment, he will still make $2,455, or about 2¼ per cent.; or, if he has the bonds, he will make the whole $3,455.

I make this calculation upon the idea that the banks are organized; that men are already doing banking business as private bankers. I do not take into account the cost of officers' salaries, &c., which would reduce the profit if the banks are not already existing; but if the banks are doing business as private bankers, it would only to a small extent increase their expense.

BANKING RESERVE.

The committee recommended a repeal of so much of the banking act as requires a reserve to be held by national-bank associations for their circulation. I doubted the wisdom of such a course. It is true that there is no necessity for banks to have at their command any money for their circulation.

Practically there is and has been no redemption since the national banks were organized. The bank-note subserves all the purposes for which the United States note can be used except when the technical tender of the latter is required for the payment of a debt. If the reserve is intended by the act to be kept to secure the certainty of immediate redemption of the bank-note, the provision is necessary.

The commercial crises of banks have never been precipitated by the inability of bankers to redeem their notes, and the run upon suspected or weakened banks has been made by their customers and not the bill-holders. The measure of the paper reserve to secure its creditors can to the best advantage be determined by comparing the circulation deposits and reserves of the banks during past years. We will find that in every case where the banks were unable to pay depositors, and were compelled to suspend, the reserve had become greatly diminished compared with circulation and deposits. We will find that when the banks have maintained a sufficient reserve compared with deposits the commercial revulsion is unable to affect them, and their credit has been maintained unimpaired.

I have prepared a table showing the percentage of bank reserves, both of specie and of money of all kinds to deposits and circulation.

The ratio of cash to deposits has hardly ever in the history of the Government fallen below 40 per cent., and the ratio of cash to deposits and circulation has fallen below 20 per cent. during only two periods in our financial history, the one during the period preceding the commercial crisis of 1857, the other before that of 1873. The latter ratio in 1850 was 25 per cent. It had fallen in 1854 to 21 per cent., in 1855-'56 to 20 per cent., and in January of 1857 to 18 per cent. The same marked decline occurs during the period ending in the panic of 1873, having fallen to 17 per cent. January, 1873, and the ratio of cash in bank to deposits was then 26 per cent.

From an examination of these tables one would say that a reserve of cash less than 20 per cent. on both circulation and deposits is unsafe and imprudent.

The amendment proposed by this section of the bill will require 15 per cent. in banks outside of redemption cities and 25 per cent. in those cities as reserve upon deposits and only 5 per cent. upon circulation. This objection would in my judgment be fatal to the bill if the banks, in accordance with the permission, allowed their reserves to run down to the lowest limit. The weak and reckless may do so, but the sound and prudent banker will not. Available cash has always been maintained to greater amount than the law required.

The reserve required to be kept by the country banker will, under the law, be as much as has been actually kept by him in his vaults, and the 5 per cent. reserve required to be kept at the Treasury, with the balances to meet drafts upon city banks, will keep up the available cash to about the same amount as now required. If the majority deem this provision advisable, I shall not on that account, though doubting its wisdom, vote against the bill because retained.

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield thirty minutes of my time to Mr. WILSON, of Indiana.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, at an early day in this session I introduced and had referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency a bill on the subject now under consideration, and which at the proper time I propose to offer as a substitute for the bill reported by the committee.

In part it is substantially the same as the committee's bill, but it contains other provisions to which in the course of my remarks I will call the attention of the House if my time will allow.

But first I desire to urge upon the House the adoption of a feature common to both, namely, that which makes the adoption of which, in my judgment, will remedy a leading defect in our currency system, which is that the amount of currency is limited by law.

For years past we have had a limit fixed by law upon the amount of the circulating medium, and no matter what were the necessities of the country we could have just so much currency and no more. We could have four hundred millions of legal-tenders and three hundred and fifty-four millions of national-bank notes. We must now meet the question whether we will let it stand at that amount or whether we will increase or diminish it, or whether we will so change the system as to impart to the amount of our currency the quality of elasticity.

Currency is simply a means, a medium, an instrument used by the people in the exchanges incident to business; and the question is, shall the means be adapted to the end or the end to the means? Shall the business of the country be restricted to a fixed amount of currency, or shall the amount of currency be made commensurate with the demands of legitimate business? I apprehend that there can be but one answer to this. I presume no one will be found here or elsewhere insisting that the business of the country shall be restricted, nor will any one be bold enough to maintain that the currency shall not be ample to supply the demands of the legitimate business of the country. But, sir, the business is constantly varying. It varies from year to year with the variations in our agricultural productions and the productions of our manufacturing industries. The amount of currency that may be amply sufficient for this year may be too much or too little for next year. The necessity for it increases with the increase of population. It might as well be said that the promissory notes necessary for a man to use when he is doing a business of $1,000 per year is ample for his purposes when he does a business of $100,000 per year, as to say that the currency necessary for thirty millions of people is adequate for forty millions of like individual thrift and energy; or it might almost as well be said that the food that is necessary to supply a nation of thirty millions is ample to satisfy the appetites of forty millions.

If the amount of currency is limited to a specific amount by law, and a season comes when that is too small, the people must suffer in their business until legislation can be had to increase it. It seems to me, therefore, that what is needed is a currency system that possesses the quality of flexibility or elasticity; making currency free to expand or contract according to the demands of legitimate business. To my mind this is not only a reasonable conclusion, but if the experience of others is of any value, it is supported by that also.

We know that in 1844 the English Parliament fixed a limit to the amount of notes that might be issued by the Bank of England; and yet we also know that, three times since, that law has had to be suspended and the bank permitted to overissue in order to prevent great financial disaster. What does this prove? It proves that the legislators of England were not wise enough to foresee the needs of the English people, nor sagacious enough to furnish them the means of avoiding financial ruin. The weakness, the imperfection of the act was demonstrated by the fact that three times it had to be violated to save the nation from bankruptcy.

Indeed, sir, it is not necessary that we shall go to England for forcible illustrations. We have them at home, and of so recent date that it is almost superfluous to allude to them. Prior to the 3d of December, 1872, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury took the responsibility of issuing $5,000,000 of the forty-four millions that had been retired by Secretary McCulloch. On the 3d of December, 1872, this House by resolution called upon the Secretary to know upon what authority and for what reason that five millions was again put in circulation. I have here his answer, an extract from which I will read. He says:

> The object of the issue was the relief of the business of the country then suffering from the large demand for currency employed in moving the crops of the South and West. The condition of affairs then existing in the country seems to me to have warranted the issue upon grounds of public policy.

This is a forcible illustration of the absolute necessity for an elastic currency, and of the perniciousness of a rigid, cast-iron system. The business of the country was suffering, and but for the fact that it so happened that the Secretary had the means at hand to relieve it, it must have continued to suffer. But that means was not the result of any wisdom in our legislation. It was an accident. Congress had fixed a limit beyond which the currency should not go. A former Secretary thought the people had too much, and he retired forty-four millions, and thus it happened that, when business was suffering for want of the means "to move the crops of the South and West," there was a reserve which could be issued, there was a means of expansion, resort to which was had and relief was obtained.

And, sir, we have had a more recent experience. We all remember very well that when the recent panic came upon the country there was a locking up of currency, and a great clamor to have the Secretary of the Treasury relieve the stringency by issuing the forty-four million reserve which had been retired to reduce the circulation. I remember to have read an article in an influential newspaper, somewhat noted for its conservative views, urging the Secretary to issue this forty-four millions and give relief, law or no law. And I need hardly remind members of the pressure brought to bear upon the President in New York at the time I allude, to avert the impending disaster by promptly causing this forty-four millions to be reissued. The logic of this certainly is that a currency system which rigidly limits the amount that can be issued is an unsafe one for the nation.

Sir, if we are going to adhere to this "cast-iron" system, who knows what the limit should be? I venture to say that there is no gentleman upon this floor who will have the courage to assert that he knows and is able to state how much currency will be needed this year or next year to meet the business wants of the country. If there is any gentleman who knows, I would be much pleased to have him name the amount. It is not possible to know the amount, and therefore there is no alternative left us but to devise a system, and it is our duty to devise one if possible, by which the supply of currency shall be regulated by the demand.

The great practical question, then, is, how shall this be done? What shall we do to make the currency elastic? Some gentlemen tell us that if we will get back to specie payment the problem will be solved; that that will bring the necessary elasticity. Now, sir, no one would be more rejoiced than myself over a return to a specie basis. There are two modes of reaching that point. One is to let the country grow up to it, the other is to depress the business of the country down to it. Which of these modes shall we adopt? Shall we supply the necessary means to give play to the energies of the people, enabling them to develop the resources of the country, or shall we put out the furnace-fires, close manufactories, throw the laboring classes out of employment, restrain enterprise, and depreciate values? This latter course will bring us back to specie payment, but it will bring inevitable ruin upon thousands and thousands. It will bring a golden era indeed to the fortunate few who have money, but it will be a cruel wrong to the multitude.

Sir, we have no moral right to pursue a policy which will force business and prices down to a specie basis. The people are not responsible for the existing condition of our monetary affairs. There came upon the country a great calamity, and the result was a greatly increased volume of the currency. Gentlemen tell us that there is a redundancy of it and that it has inflated prices. Well, for the sake of the argument, let me grant it. Could the business of the country stop? Were the people to cease buying and selling? Could they fold their arms in idleness and wait for a change? No, sir; their energies would not allow them to do that, nor was it the interest of the nation that they should. They adapted themselves to this new state of affairs for which they were not responsible, they bought and sold at the inflated prices, they gave notes and mortgages, they felled forests, they built houses and barns and turnpike roads and railroads and incurred indebtedness in so doing, and now gentlemen who have their pockets full of money say to their less fortunate neighbors, "Your business must be broken up, your property must be depreciated in value, the mortgages upon it must be foreclosed, you laboring men must do without work, and your wives and children without bread, in order that we may get back to specie payment, i. e., in order that the national-bank notes and the legal-tender notes we have may be increased in value until they are equal to gold dollar for dollar." Sir, it is a policy that must make the "rich richer, and the poor poorer." If it has any merit, it is in its conformity to that scriptural idea, that "to him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken even that which he hath."

That is one way to get to specie payment and to procure such elasticity as it would bring, but it would be cruel and unjust, and therefore not the right way. I prefer the other mode, i. e., to have the country grow up to it, and to secure the necessary elasticity in some other way than by forcing specie payments now.

I have already argued that a fixed amount of currency is wrong in principle, and if I am right in that it necessarily follows that we must either take off the restrictions upon the issue of Government notes, or we must remove the limit upon the issue of national-bank bills. Which shall we do? If we do the latter, it obviously involves doing away with all other circulating notes.

There are manifest objections to the removal of the restrictions upon the issue of legal-tenders. Every legal tender is an evidence of Government indebtedness; it is a promise to pay, and the payment when made must be in gold. If, therefore, the restriction upon the issue of these notes is removed, it would place it necessarily in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury or some officer of the Government to indefinitely increase the national debt; it would place the amount of the indebtedness of the country practically under the control of one man. Besides this, it can hardly be good policy to make the mere evidence of the country's indebtedness the circulating medium of the country.

CAN LEGAL-TENDERS BE NOW ISSUED?

There is yet another reason why we should not resort to Government notes. They would be worthless as a circulating medium unless they had the quality of being a legal tender; and if we undertake now, in time of peace, to issue Government notes and make them a legal tender, we are confronted with the grave question, "Have we the constitutional power to do so under existing circumstances?"

It is well known that when it was first proposed to make the notes of the Government a legal tender for the payment of debts, although we were then in the throes of rebellion and pressed by the direst necessity, even under those circumstances many able men, with a multitude of adherents, insisted that there was no constitutional power to do so; even those who favored it did so with extreme reluctance, as the following quotations from the debates of the period will show:

Mr. Spaulding, of New York, introduced the first bill, and he said that he offered it as a war measure, to meet the most pressing demands upon the Treasury; a measure of necessity and not of choice, to sustain the Army and Navy. "These," said he, "are extraordinary times, and extraordinary measures must be resorted to in order to save our Government and preserve our nationality."

Mr. Campbell, of Pennsylvania, said:

> The bill now before the committee is necessary to sustain the credit of the country and to carry on the war. It is with reluctance that I have come to this conclusion.

Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, said:

> This bill is a measure of necessity, not of choice. No one would willingly issue paper currency not redeemable on demand and make it a legal tender.

Mr. Fessenden said:

> It has been defended simply and solely upon the ground that it is to be a single measure, standing by itself, and not to be repeated. It is put on the ground of absolute, overwhelming necessity, that the Government has now arrived at that point where it must have funds, and those funds are not to be obtained from ordinary sources, or from any of the expedients to which we have heretofore had recourse; and therefore this new, anomalous, and remarkable provision must be resorted to in order to enable the Government to pay off the debt that it now owes, and afford circulation which will be available for other purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN said:

I agree that this measure can only be justified on the ground of necessity. If I did not feel its necessity I should vote against it on constitutional grounds

Mr. Howard said:

It is undoubtedly a hard necessity to which we are driven.

I might quote much more to the same effect; but this is enough to show the extreme reluctance with which leading men at that time assented to such a policy. In addition to this I need hardly call the attention of the House to the fact that the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States have been divided in opinion on this question.

It is safe to say that if the power exists at all, it is to be found in that provision of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to pass all laws that may be "necessary and proper" to carry into effect the enumerated powers. Whatever is "necessary and proper" to "collect taxes," to "borrow money," to "regulate commerce," to "raise and support armies," to "provide and maintain a navy," and so on, Congress may undoubtedly do. And I admit that Congress is the judge of what is "necessary and proper" to be done for these purposes or either of them. But it is not a matter of simple discretion on the part of Congress, or mere will power, but of sound judgment. I understand the rule laid down by the Supreme Court to be this, that Congress is the judge of the necessity and propriety of the act, and therefore, when Congress enacts such a law, the enactment is a determination of the fact that it was necessary and proper to enact it, and that determination the Supreme Court will not review, but will treat that determination, so to speak, as res adjudicata, and therefore will hold the act to be constitutional. In the case of McCulloch vs. Maryland, (4 Wheaton,) Chief Justice Marshall said:

When the law is not prohibited, and is really calculated to effect any of the objects intrusted to the Government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department, and to tread on legislative ground.

This is quoted with approbation by the Supreme Court in the Legal-tender cases, (12 Wallace, page 542.) In this case the court, after laying down the rule that Congress had the right to make a choice of means to secure a legitimate end, proceeds to use the language which I will read from page 542. It is as follows:

Is it our province to decide that the means selected—

That is, making the notes of the Government a legal tender—

were beyond the constitutional power of Congress, because we may think that the other means to the same ends would have been more appropriate and equally efficient? That would be to assume legislative power, and to disregard the accepted rules for construing the Constitution. The degree of the necessity for any congressional enactment or the relative degree of its appropriateness is for consideration in Congress, not here.

Here it will be perceived that the Supreme Court has expressly decided that what is necessary and proper to be done for the purpose of carrying into effect any power under the Constitution is a question for congressional determination, and not for the determination of the Supreme Court. We are not therefore to be governed and cannot be governed by what the Supreme Court would say with reference to such an act; for if we should pass it the Supreme Court would simply say, "By enacting it you adjudged that it was necessary and proper to do so, and we will not go behind that judgment." Hence the duty of judging in the first instance as to whether it is "necessary and proper" is upon us, and that judgment is practically conclusive.

As I said before, it is not a mere matter of arbitrary will power, but of sound judgment in view of the situation of the country and the end to be attained. The question then is, is there a state of facts or circumstances now existing which renders it "necessary and proper" to make an additional issue of Government notes and declare them a legal tender? For our determination on that subject we are responsible. Then, I put the question for the deliberate judgment of each member of this House, is there anything in the present condition of the country which makes it "necessary and proper" to issue additional Government notes and make them a legal tender? Is it necessary and proper that we should do so in order to "borrow money," or to "support armies," or to "provide and maintain a navy," or to "collect taxes?" Does any one of these, or do all of them combined, call upon us to exercise this power? If so, we may exercise it; if not, we cannot exercise it without transgressing against the Constitution. It may be argued that the States are prohibited from issuing bills of credit, and that therefore Congress alone has that power; and that to make these effective Congress may make them a legal tender. Let that be granted, and again I ask the question, are there any existing facts or circumstances which render it "necessary and proper" to resort to such an expedient? Is it necessary, to secure a safe and reliable circulating medium, that the debt of the nation shall be increased? I do not believe that there is anything that we are called upon to do under any or all of the enumerated powers of the Constitution which makes it "necessary and proper" that we should make a further issue of Government notes.

I cannot, therefore, give my assent to a resort to a mode of supplying any additional currency that the business of the country may require which involves increasing the public debt, and which is, to say the very least, of such doubtful constitutionality.

How, then, are we to provide the needed currency, and make it elastic? My answer is, by means of our national banks, and the legal-tenders already issued.

Since we have experienced the recent panic—and no man has been the loser by reason of being a bill-holder—it is unnecessary to argue that these banks whose circulating notes are secured by Government bonds will give the people a safe circulating medium. Here we have a class of bank-notes absolutely safe to the holder, and of uniform value throughout the country; and to this system we may resort to supply the country with such a volume of currency as may be needed, and we may, if the rule that the demand will regulate the supply is a safe one, make it an important aid to giving it elasticity.

Having argued that a limited currency is not the sound doctrine, and against the issue of any more legal-tender notes, I am necessarily brought to the conclusion that the limit should be removed as to the issue of national-bank notes; or, in other words, that banking under this system should be free to all. Why should it not be free to all who can furnish the necessary security to the bill-holders? Why should a few men have the privilege of issuing circulating notes, to the exclusion of all others of equal means, facilities, and abilities? As the system now is it is a monopoly, and a monopoly cannot but be hurtful. It has the power to prey upon the people by reason of their necessities. It is contrary to the whole genius and spirit of our institutions to give special privileges to individuals or classes. If banking is made free, it not only furnishes the means of adapting the supply to the demand, but it produces competition, the tendency of which will be to cheapen money to the people.

But gentlemen tell us that if we make banking free the volume of the currency will be increased, and they say we do not want any more currency. I do not believe that it will increase the amount unless an increase is needed, and if it is needed it ought to be increased. I notice that this objection to an increase comes with striking unanimity from gentlemen representing New England. It is perhaps unfortunate for each of us that we judge of the whole country by our own particular locality instead of taking a survey of every part.

When recently I introduced some resolutions asserting that instead of imposing additional taxes to the extent of $42,000,000, as we were called upon to do, the true policy was to afford the people increased facilities for business, and thereby increase the revenues, I was struck with the unanimity with which gentlemen from New England voted against that idea, and I looked into the statistics to see if I could find anything to account for the fact that while the West and South were voting for those resolutions, New England was voting the other way.

I found that New England, with a population of three and one-half millions of people and two and three-quarter billions of wealth, has one hundred and ten millions of circulation; while the Western States, with eleven and one-half millions of population and three and one-half billions of wealth, have seventy-five millions of circulation.

These gentlemen may well say that they do not want any more currency; that they do not want any more facilities than this circulation affords them. They have an average of thirty-one dollars per capita, while the Western States have an average of seven dollars per capita of population.

If thirty-one dollars per capita is a good thing for the constituents of gentlemen from New England, I think it would be hard to show why it would not be a good thing for mine. If they have a surfeit of circulation, why do not they get rid of it? They seem to hold fast to all that they have. Indeed there was an act passed to withdraw from that locality $25,000,000 and distribute it to the West and South, but I have not heard of any haste to part with it. There are demands for more in the district I represent, but it cannot be had; and if New England has too much, some of my constituents are ready to take a part of it. I venture modestly to ask either that more shall be authorized or that you shall make a fair division of what is now authorized.

But, sir, they will not willingly give any of it up. They do not think they have any too much, and it is very evident that they do not think they can get along with any less than they have, and they know too well and cherish too highly the advantages of the business facilities it affords. A few days ago those who represent the national banks of the State of Rhode Island sent us a memorial protesting against the withdrawal of any circulation from that State, and giving it to the West and South, and asking that the existing law looking to the redistribution of $25,000,000, for the purpose of equalizing the sections, should be repealed. Here is that memorial:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, citizens of the State of Rhode Island, representing the various national banking institutions of the State, respectfully represent:

That the provisions of the sixth section of the act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes, approved July 12, 1870, directing in effect the withdrawal from the banking associations which were the first to organize under the act to provide a national banking currency, &c., of their circulating notes to the amount of $25,000,000, will operate, if enforced by any legislation providing for machinery to give effect to the section of the law referred to, very prejudicially to the interests of this State and of New England.

The national banking capital in the State amounts to $20,500,000, and the amount of bonds pledged for circulation is about $15,000,000.

All of the national banking associations organized promptly after the passage of the act, and at the time when it was of vital importance to the preservation of the Government that the financial system by the act inaugurated should be accepted by the country.

The very large and varied manufacturing and mechanical industries in this State, the extent of which will be best appreciated from the fact that the first collection district paid a larger internal-revenue tax on manufactures for several years into the Treasury than any other in the country, require for their successful prosecution all the banking facilities which the State now has. To contract any part of the circulation would directly diminish the volume of money resources, enhance the value of currency necessarily required for the weekly payment of thousands of operatives, and create financial disturbance, all resulting in the end in an increase of burden upon the consumer.

The undersigned believe that the attempt to equalize the distribution of currency by withdrawals from the earlier organized banking associations of a percentage of their circulation, to be given to associations in States and Territories having less than their proportion, would be attended with greater loss to the industrial communities which would suffer thereby than could possibly result from equalizing the proportions of circulation by increasing the volume of currency to the extent of twenty-five millions for the benefit of associations in the States and Territories having less than their proportion.

The undersigned therefore pray that the sixth section of the act above referred to be repealed; and they respectfully protest against the passage of the bill just reported from the Finance Committee, to provide for carrying into effect the sixth section of said act.

It is signed by the officers of thirty-two banks in the State of Rhode Island.

Turning to the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency I find that Rhode Island has a circulation of $61.59 for each man, woman, and child in the State; and then by the same report I find that Indiana has a circulation of $8.75 for each man, woman, and child in that State.

It is very evident that these Rhode Island bankers find that this banking privilege is a desirable one to have, else they would not hold to it so pertinaciously. They tell us that no part of their circulating notes can be withdrawn from them and given to the West and South without operating "very prejudicially to the interests of the State and New England." They say that "their manufacturing and mechanical industries require for their successful prosecution all the banking facilities the State now has." And yet, sir, these very gentlemen seem to be unable to appreciate, and all New England seems to be unable to appreciate, that the banking facilities which they regard as so essential to their prosperity are equally essential to the prosperity of the West and South.

A few days since my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] had the pleasure of an interview with some of the "solid men" of Boston, in which he called their attention to this subject. He said:

There is also the question of withdrawing twenty-five millions from Boston and distributing it South and West. * * * In regard to the twenty-five million project, I shall not allow that to be withdrawn from Massachusetts if I can help it.

He was very anxious to have these solid men aid him in defeating that proposition. Why? Because he thought it would seriously affect the "material interests of Boston."

By the report of the Comptroller of the Currency I find that Massachusetts has a circulation of $40.84 per capita.

If we talk about redistribution, so as to equalize these facilities between the various sections of the country, we are met by the declaration, "Money will always go where it is needed, no matter where the bank is situated." Well, let me grant that to be true. If it is true, then why should there be any opposition to letting us have our fair proportion of this circulation? According to this proposition, if we get $25,000,000 more of this circulation in the West and South by withdrawing it from New England and it is needed in New England, it will go there; therefore New England would not be injured.

Sir, this proposition that money will go where it is needed, as applied to this question, is a delusion; it is an artful dodging of the real question involved.

If all the circulation of the country were issued from a bank on the top of Mount Washington it would be the same as now, so far as the mere matter of circulation is concerned; that circulation would ebb and flow backward and forward throughout all the veins and arteries of trade according to its inexorable demands, just as it does now, and just as it always will, but the capital essential to its issue would be all concentrated at that point. It is not the mere question of the places whence these bills shall be sent out on their mission, but it is the matter of the facilities for doing business, for making exchanges, for the concentration of capital, making it readily accessible to merchants, manufacturers, traders, mechanics, farmers, that is of consequence. It is of infinite importance to the people that the surplus capital shall be distributed about over the country, so that it may be easily accessible to the business men of every locality. If all the money of the country were issued from the district I represent, Rhode Island would have just as much money as she has to-day, perhaps, but she would not have her present business facilities.

The reason New England is so reluctant to yield up any of her circulation is that it would deprive her of the business facilities it affords, and the business facilities afforded by it is what the West and South want.

I take occasion now to say, lest I may forget it, that I do not believe in the redistribution policy. I am willing that New England shall have all the facilities for business she now has. I would not take a single one away from her; I am glad that she has them; I am proud of her prosperity. All that I ask is that we shall not be deprived of like facilities; that, having gotten what they want, they shall not close the door against us; that they shall help us to open the door, to the end that we may avail ourselves of such facilities as the demands of our business, our industries require. To refuse this is both ungenerous and unjust.

I am afraid that some of our New England friends are disposed to be a little selfish on this subject, and if they find some of us of the West and South a little determined in looking after our interests they must not complain. We can control this Government if we choose; but if we do it will be, I trust, always upon principles of justice to all, equal rights and privileges to all. But I fear that is not the spirit of some of our friends. I have called attention to the spirit in Rhode Island; now let me attract the attention of the House to a colloquy that occurred a few days since between the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. JEWETT.] That the moral of it may be seen, I call attention to the fact that the report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that while Connecticut has a circulation of $31.48 for each man, woman, and child in the State, Ohio has a circulation of $8.96 for each man, woman, and child. That is the difference between the two States, each represented in part by the gentlemen I have named.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] said:

I have a few words more in regard to this complaint that I have heard several members make upon this floor, and which seems to be re-echoed by the press of the South and West, that we have more than our fair share of circulation, and that unless we will consent here and now to give you eighty or one hundred millions more of national currency or greenbacks, in a measure which we think most disastrous and ruinous to the whole country, to your interests and to ours, in some way or other you are going to take away the surplus over our share of circulation, as you call it.

Mr. JEWETT. Have you more circulation than you need?

Mr. KELLOGG. We have not in our section, and we cannot keep what we have got. There are from five to ten millions of our circulation to-day out in your Western States. We cannot keep enough for our business purposes at some seasons of the year, because men go to the West with it and get 10 and 12 per cent. interest upon it when they cannot get more than 6 or 7 per cent. with us.

Sir, that is a frank confession of the very thing of which we complain. Money is too dear with us; 10 and 12 per cent. is the lowest rate at which it can be obtained. Our New England friends who, according to my friend from Connecticut, can only get 6 and 7 per cent. at home with the large amount of circulation they have, (thirty-three dollars per capita,) can go over into the valley of the Mississippi, with its boundless natural capacities for wealth and prosperity, but where there is less than eight dollars per capita, and lend for 10 and 12 per cent. Thus the industries of the West and South are taxed; thus they pay tribute at the rate of 4 to 6 per cent. My friend says that that money they are lending us they need at home for their own business at some seasons of the year. If so, how much the greater must be our necessities when we will pay for the use of it so great an interest! He confessed that they had not any more than they wanted, that at some seasons of the year they had not enough; he is unwilling to let go of any they have, and is also unwilling that we, who are not nearly so well supplied, and are in need of the facilities which they so highly prize, and which are afforded by the circulation they have, shall be provided for. And, sir, he was not content with informing us of our condition of dependence, which we had long ago learned by experience, but he went further and said:

I propose to ask my good friends of the South and West what they are going to do about it?

Well, sir, I cannot speak for others in answering this question; but I venture to call attention to the fact that the West and South have the power to control this matter. We who represent those sections can, if we will, correct the legislation which now makes us pay tribute to other sections. We can, if we will, give to our constituencies the same facilities that others possess; and I know that the time has come when they expect us to look after their interests, and when they will have men here who will do so. And answering the question for myself, I take this occasion to say that I shall not rest content until a law has been enacted that will give to every section of the country an equal chance; which will cut off the enormous tribute which we are now paying, according to the gentleman's statement, to our more fortunate neighbors in the East; which will give the country ample currency for the demands of business, and which will give to the West and South the banking facilities they need. This would be accomplished in my judgment by free banking; but if I cannot get that, then I shall vote for the next best proposition, i. e., to take away from the States that have an excess of circulation and distribute that excess among those that have not a fair share, and thereby equalize the States in this regard.

Mr. DAWES. I have listened to the gentleman's argument in favor of free banking with great interest, as I have always listened to what he has had to say, but I do not understand what occasion he had to arraign New England. I do not speak for any one but myself, and I know I have never said anything, and do not know of any vote recorded by New England, which would justify that arraignment. I say what I believe to be the sentiment of New England, that she is in favor of free banking as much as the West if it can be properly guarded, and that the only desire on her part is that it shall have such limitations in regard to circulation and redemption as will be as much for the interest of the West as for the interest of New England. I have a bill, drawn by myself, which contains a section in regard to free banking, and I have taken pains in it that there shall be such guards thrown around the issue and redemption as will prevent any inflation or explosion which would injure the West just as much as the East. I do not know why it is, then, that the gentleman feels called upon to arraign New England in reference to this question of free banking. I think New England is as much for it as the West, provided only that safe redemption can be secured; and this is as essential for the West as for the East.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to explain a remark which fell from me in this connection when I proposed some weeks ago to make this bill a special order and asked for a suspension of the rules. I noticed with some degree of regret and surprise that with the exception of one gentleman from Massachusetts, who seems to have voted a little wildly on that subject, and one more from Maine, whom I do not now see in his seat, the entire vote of New England was solidly against me.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman understand that to be because there was a section in his bill for free banking? I understand that it was for a very different reason. I was not here, however, and do not know. I venture to say if the gentleman will bring forward a bill for free banking alone, properly guarded—so guarded in respect to issue and redemption as to take care of the West just as much as of the East—he will not find New England voting against it.

Mr. MAYNARD. There is a section, the last section of the bill, which perhaps can hardly be called a free-banking section.

Mr. DAWES. When I reported the bill in reference to the four hundred million United States notes, I expressly said, representing the Committee on Ways and Means, that it was their intention to supplement that section with other sections, one of them containing among other things free banking; not like the one in this bill, but so guarded as to make free banking with redemption safe both East and West.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask leave to utter just one sentence, to say that there has not been a period since the inauguration of this Government, or since the struggle for our independence began, in which gentlemen from the rest of the country have not been arraigning New England as selfish—since the time when Sam. Adams's life was not safe in Philadelphia because he was in favor of independence. And there has not been a single one of the policies she has maintained to which the rest of the country has not in time come round, confessing that her views were as much to their interest as their own. And I am very sorry if my colleague [Mr. DAWES] has to apologize for or flinch from any attitude we take on this question.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know what occasion my colleague has to say that I have apologized. I have made no apology. I am giving my idea of the sentiment of New England on the question of free banking. If I have done it in a manner that appeared to be apologizing or flinching, then I do not understand what is the nature of a fair and candid statement, before this House, of what I believe to be the tone of public sentiment in New England upon a question under discussion here. And I am not here watching any of my colleagues to see whether I can find in their words occasion to set myself up above them, as standing up for the rights of New England better than they.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, rose.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I want to say just a single word.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman from Connecticut first.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I do not think I can yield further.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I wish to say just one word.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. It is very evident that these gentlemen cannot harmoniously settle the attitude of New England among themselves.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Give us three minutes and we will let you have time enough to finish your speech.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Then go ahead.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I desire to speak a word for one small section of New England. I do not care how much money there is in the country. The more the better, if it is good money. I do not care how much capital there is in the country. The more the better. It is capital that the gentleman wants in Indiana rather than money. In Connecticut, for two hundred years, we have saved almost every dollar we have earned, and put it away in savings-banks and otherwise. It is because we have done this that we have got something to send to the West.

Now, as to the matter of distributing the currency——

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I must really resume the floor.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I just want one minute to tell the gentleman what bill I will go for. If you wish more banking facilities rather than increase the volume of irredeemable paper, take this course: authorize new banks and retire circulation from the older sections of the country pari passu with the issue of the new circulation, so that the aggregate of the volume in the country will remain the same. I would be willing to vote for that. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and other gentlemen from New England may speak for themselves.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think I am called upon to say a word here. And I desire simply to say that I have the advantage of never having to apologize to New England for any vote I have ever given. While representing her on this floor I have given votes for the country, thank God, the whole country. And I think I was doing my duty to New England when I abstained from arraying her and her interests for one moment against the interests of the whole country. Now, sir, I am not willing to flood the country with irredeemable paper money issued by corporations, to make money for themselves, and withdraw from circulation the money of the people, the green back, which alone is the basis upon which all the bank paper is sustained. The gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] if he can have more bank paper in New England and elsewhere, out of which men can make money and have all the chance to grind the poor man, is quite willing to have that sort of irredeemable paper money; but he is against the people issuing their own money, without price, without anybody to tax it, without anybody to put it into the pockets of other people, and take toll on it as it goes along. All the property of the nation, all the wealth of the nation, all there is of this Government, was saved by the greenback; and behind the greenback is a pledge for its redemption in the taxes of the country, in the property of the country, and not alone in the gold of the country, which we of New England may have a little more of than some of the rest of the States of the Union.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman please point out the link that fastens his greenback to the security which he says gives it its value? How may the holder of it realize the security?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is fastened by the votes of honest Congressmen that do not vote for banks.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. So far from making any attack upon New England, I have already said in the course of my remarks that I am proud of her prosperity; that I would not withdraw from her a single facility in the business which she has—not one. On the contrary, I desire that she shall have every facility that is in our power to give her. What I did do was to criticise the manner in which this matter has been discussed upon the floor of this House during this debate. I do not now know exactly the attitude which New England occupies upon this floor upon this free-banking question; but if my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] says that he has never opposed free banking, if that is the attitude of New England, then, of course, we are hand in hand together upon this question. It is but natural that we should differ in opinions upon this subject. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has just announced himself in favor of a greenback currency. I have been arguing against that on grounds which I think are sound. He and I differ on that question, and other gentlemen differ with me like him on that question. There is a diversity of opinion with reference to it. All that I am contending for is that this thing shall be so adjusted that every section of the country shall have equal facilities for the transaction of business, and I believe that that will be accomplished by free banking.

HAVE WE TOO MUCH CURRENCY NOW?

But gentlemen tell us that if we make banking free we will increase the currency, and that we have too much already. I want to consider that for a moment.

I do not place very great reliance upon comparisons between different periods, or comparisons between different countries in settling a question like this. But if there is any virtue in such comparisons, it would indicate very strongly that we have not enough.

In the United Kingdom the circulation is about twenty-three dollars per capita. In the United States, taking the country all over, it is sixteen dollars per capita. But in the former case the people are compressed into a comparatively small territory. They have banking facilities at their very doors. The means of making their exchanges are abundant, and consequently a comparatively small amount of circulation is essential. A little money will go a great way under such circumstances. Our population is scattered over a vast area, and in the West especially facilities are limited. Hence the people are compelled to keep the money necessary for their business in their pockets, and to that extent it is not in active circulation. This would indicate that we need more per capita than our neighbors across the Atlantic; yet they have seven dollars per capita more than we have. Unless you can prove that they have too much, this proves that we have too little. And there is yet another consideration. Their country is already developed. They have made their improvements; we are just developing ours. We are building our dwellings, our shops and manufactories, and bringing wildernesses and waste places under cultivation. This comparison would indicate that we have not enough.

If we make a comparison by periods in our own country the result will be found the same.

In 1860 we had thirty-one millions population; in 1870 we had thirty-eight millions. In 1860 our wealth was $16,000,000,000, while in 1870 it was $30,000,000,000. In 1860 we had an active circulation of $300,000,000, while now we have an active circulation of less than $600,000,000. It is impossible to ascertain with accuracy the amount. It is probably not over five hundred millions. The chairman of the committee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] who has no doubt examined the matter with care, places the amount much lower than that. When we consider the vast increase of our business between those two dates, and the extent to which the people have scattered themselves abroad over a vast expanse of country that in 1860 was totally uninhabited, thereby placing themselves remote from business centers, and compelling them to have actual money for want of the usual devices of trade, it is apparent that the increase has not kept pace with our needs. Besides this, we now have a use for money that we did not have in 1860 to the same extent. Then we had three hundred millions of circulation, and we used eighty millions in the way of revenues paid to the Government. Less than one-fourth of the amount of circulation passed through the Treasury. Now we have less than six hundred millions of active circulation, and we use three hundred and thirty millions in paying revenues to the Government, or more than one-half of the circulation passes through the Treasury per annum. I do not pretend that the amount collected as revenues is withdrawn from circulation, but I refer to this to show that here is a use for money that has enormously increased since 1860, and that use or demand for money has grown in equal proportion with reference to local taxes.

The increase of the circulating medium has by no means kept pace with the increase of the necessities for it; the increase and spread of population, the increase of business, the increase in the needs of the Government, national and local.

HOW IMMEDIATE RELIEF MAY BE OBTAINED.

Something is necessary to be done to revive business. Many productions have stopped; many, many men and women are out of employment; there can be no question about that. The country is the loser every day for the want of their labor, and they are the sufferers for the want of the comforts that labor would bring. When the panic came the money was locked up and business stopped; and it is idle to deny that it is the want of money in the usual avenues of business that has stopped it. There is an easy mode of relieving the country from this difficulty. There is now a large amount locked up in the banks as reserves on circulation. It is wholly unnecessary to keep it there. The circulation is amply secured by the bonds on deposit in the Treasury. This reserve can be set free without endangering the safety of the circulating notes. I propose that we shall do this by repealing that portion of the existing law which requires the banks to hold this reserve. This would give immediate relief, and to all sections of the country at the same time; for at every point where there is a bank there would be additional money ready for use upon the instant that the act was passed.

MONEY PANICS AND A RESERVE.

But, sir, I am far from believing that to make banking free is all that is necessary to be done.

A money panic is ruinous to the people, and if there is any device by which such calamities can be avoided in the future, its adoption would be a blessing to the nation.

Every one knows that the recent panic grew out of a want of confidence, not in the circulating medium, for everybody had confidence in that, but in the banks of the country. A great banking house failed because of the character of the business it had been doing, the kind of securities it had taken for its loans or its investments in corporation stocks and bonds; and when that house failed it created universal apprehension as to all others, and those who had money on deposit demanded it, because they knew it was good, that it would not become worthless in their own hands, and they were afraid to trust it longer with the banks. Thus it went out of circulation, the banks could not discount, and business came to a stand-still, with the most disastrous consequences.

It is pretty generally, I believe, conceded, that the remedy for this is a strong reserve, to which resort can be had in cases such as this. The Bank of England wards off panics by freely issuing from its reserve; and when the reserve is not strong enough it is permitted to overissue, as I have before stated. I propose to remedy this defect in our system by creating a strong reserve in our national Treasury. I propose that as fast as circulation is issued to newly organized banks, and when the revenues of the Government are in excess of current demands, the Secretary of the Treasury shall retire legal-tender notes into a reserve fund to the amount of $100,000,000, to be held for the sole purpose of issuing to those who may desire any portion of it upon a deposit of United States bonds, the interest on the bonds to cease while they are deposited in the Treasury. That is to say, if A has $10,000 or any other sum in Government bonds, and desires a like amount in notes for the purpose of his business, he may deposit the bonds with the Secretary and receive notes to a like amount; but there shall be no interest on the bonds while they are thus deposited. This would cost the Government nothing; it does not involve any increase of the Government debt; but it creates what is now so much needed—a reserve fund, safe, reliable, permanent, which would give confidence to the people. It would not only give relief if a panic came, but would tend strongly to prevent panics altogether. The very fact that there was such a fund would give confidence to the people, and the existence of such a reserve would tend strongly to prevent that pernicious practice of those most pestilent of all gamblers, the stock-gamblers—the practice of cornering the money market. When they set themselves to work to corner the money market, they would consider the fact that here was a reserve of $100,000,000 that they must corner also; the maddest "bull" and the hungriest "bear" would hesitate long before venturing upon a speculation that involved so great an undertaking.

But, sir, I propose by a portion of this substitute to do something to protect the country against the evils arising out of this practice of

GAMBLING IN STOCKS.

Depositors expect the banks to lend the money deposited, but they have a right to expect that the banker in whom they confide shall make his loans upon reliable security. But, sir, one source of financial misfortune grows out of the practice of lending upon the security of corporation stocks and bonds. When a crisis comes many of these cannot be converted into money; the bank that has made loans upon such security fails, and carries other banks and business men down with it into a common ruin. Against this peril depositors have a right to be protected, and I propose to protect them by requiring the bank examiner to ascertain whether the bank is lending upon such security, and if so, to publish the fact in the newspapers where the bank does business. I take it for granted that no prudent business man would keep his deposit account with a bank that was lending his money upon doubtful corporation stocks or bonds, and therefore I apprehend that no bank that desired to receive deposits would make such loans. The managers would know that so soon as such a report was published, every prudent banker would withdraw his balances from that bank, and every prudent business man would withdraw his deposits.

Such a provision certainly could do no harm, and it seems to me would furnish a great deal of protection to the business men of the country. It would tend to confine banking to legitimate channels.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman whether it is not true that a bank examiner is now under prosecution for having received bribes to the amount of $76,000 from banks to make false reports under your present system?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I am not apprised of that fact.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Has not the experience of mankind shown that the motives to which you have adverted are insufficient to secure the public and depositors and to control the banks against the dangers which you have described? Will it not be necessary to have the Government interfere and stop the operations of the bank when such abuses exist?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I think I have provided in the bill which I have introduced to meet the very point which the gentleman from Massachusetts suggests.

With reference to the point made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] the fact that a bank examiner has turned out to be a scoundrel is no reason why there should not be some restrictions placed on the banks.

Mr. KELLEY. I would ask the gentleman whether the failures of the banks here and elsewhere have not disclosed the fact that the bank examiners had either been false to their trust or incapable of discovering the frauds of the banks?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. All that may be true. It is an argument against the weakness and corruptibility of our human nature, and not an argument against trying to devise some system by which honest men can be protected against the practices of these banks.

Mr. MERRIAM. In eleven years only eleven of the national banks have failed, a condition of things unprecedented under any other system.

Mr. KELLEY. That does not answer my question about the dereliction on the part of the bank examiners. I think it a better plan to keep temptation from poor, weak, human nature, than to place it largely before men and then trust to some one man to prevent fraud.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I take it for granted that when we undertake to legislate on a subject of this kind we must do the best we can. It certainly is our duty to protect the depositors as far as we possibly can. At present this matter of depositing money in banks is a mere matter of faith, and it is a faith that is predicated upon no knowledge whatever as to what the bank is doing. The depositor has a right to know what the bank is doing with his money, and if we can devise any means by which he shall not simply live by faith but shall have something upon which he can predicate that faith, we ought in my judgment to do it.

PAYING INTEREST ON DEPOSITS.

There is still another restriction that it seems now to be generally conceded should be placed upon the banks. I refer to the practice of paying interest on deposits, and I have proposed to prohibit this by the amendment forbidding it so far as the banks themselves are concerned. For obvious reasons it is not proposed to prevent the payment of interest to individual depositors. If Congress had the power to prevent all banks from paying interest on deposits, it would be well to do so, but it has no power over private banks or State institutions, and cannot prohibit them. If, therefore, we should prohibit the national banks from paying interest to individual depositors, all the deposits would flow into the others. But it is so universally conceded that the practice of paying or receiving interest to and from each other is an exceedingly pernicious one, that I will not discuss it. I take it for granted that the House will prohibit it in the future.

Mr. MAYNARD. What difference will there be if you prohibit the national banks from depositing with each other and permit them to make their deposits with private bankers?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I think if the gentleman will look at the phraseology of my bill he will find that I have met that difficulty.

There is one other matter to which I desire to call attention in this connection. As I said before, we are told that money will go where it is wanted, and as furnishing an evidence of this I notice that the newspapers are laying stress upon the fact that when the Secretary of the Treasury recently issued largely out of the forty-four million reserve, a very large part of it found its way into the banks of New York. That is proof of an evil I am seeking to correct. Our banks in the West, instead of keeping the money received from depositors at home, keep balances in New York, on which they can draw at any time and on which they get interest. This all works well enough until trouble comes, but when the New York banks get into trouble it brings all that have balances there into trouble also. It is the demand made by the stock-gambling operations in New York that entices these balances there. It is an unnatural, an immoral, and should be an illegal demand. If we prevent the payment of interest on balances and virtually prevent loans on stock securities, the result will be that these balances will be kept at home where the depositors have a right to expect them to be. If they are where they should be, in the bank where the depositor places them, then a corner in New York would not disturb the financial affairs of the whole country. But I need not enlarge upon this.

Mr. Speaker, with free banking coupled with the restrictions I have adverted to, and a strong reserve, I cannot see why we would not have a healthy and reliable circulating medium, and be reasonably secure against panics in the future. And I am unable to see why it would seriously interfere with a return to specie payments in the future. I do not believe that free banking will increase the circulation beyond the actual needs of the country. Whenever the Government can return to specie payment, the banks and people will be ready. By creating the reserve of which I have spoken, and by the additional use for legal-tenders by newly organized banks, they would soon come to be regarded as the basis of our currency system, and their value would be appreciated. I believe it would tend to hasten rather than retard specie payments. But whatever might be the effect in that regard, it would give the people all the currency they actually need, of undoubted reliability, and would give to every section of the country the opportunity to supply itself with business facilities which are indispensable to prosperity.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, obtained the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. With the permission of the gentleman, I ask leave to have printed an amendment which I propose to offer in lieu of the first proviso to the third section of the bill of the committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent to have printed an amendment which I propose to offer.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. If the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] will yield to me, I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. KELLEY. Before the motion to adjourn is put, I desire to give notice to the House that at the proper time I shall move to substitute for the bill of the committee the bill No. 539, which is known as the three sixty-five bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I desire to say that I shall offer a substitute for the bill of the committee at the proper time.

Mr. MAYNARD. It has been suggested to me that there should be a session for debate to-night, and gentlemen have expressed a willingness to come here and take part in the discussion. I ask that there may be a session to-night for the purpose of debate only, no other business to be transacted.

Mr. BECK. I must object. I am to have fifteen minutes in which to speak, and I do not care to come here to-night and speak to the Clerk alone.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that the fifteen minutes of the gentleman will come in to-night.

Mr. KELLEY. I take it there has been no more important subject than this before the House, and I think that there should be full time expended in a generous discussion of it before the members of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be an agreement that the speeches hereafter shall be limited to something less than an hour each.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not think I can yield further.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have thought it proper to submit a proposition for an evening session to the House, and to state that gentlemen have assured me that they desire to come here and speak to-night. If that proposition is not acceptable——

Mr. KELLEY. If gentlemen desire to come here and speak to-night, I will vote for a recess; but I do not want to force gentlemen to speak at night who really want to get the attention of members of the House to what they may say.

Mr. HOLMAN. I again ask that by unanimous consent, after the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] has concluded his remarks, speeches shall be limited to twenty minutes each.

Mr. COX. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Otherwise there will be great injustice done to a large number of members who will not have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has taken hold of the wrong end. Nearly all the time occupied on this bill up to the present has been occupied by members of the committee reporting this bill. I think the members of the House generally should have an opportunity to speak upon it without any further limitation than that applied to members of the committee.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have an amendment which I wish to offer if I get the opportunity, and I ask that it may be printed.

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit to the House the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] that there be a session to-night for debate only upon the pending bill, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not like to object to that proposition, and would not but for the effect it may have upon my right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. It will not affect that right; the gentleman will be entitled to the floor the next time the consideration of this bill is resumed in a day session of the House.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Then I will not object.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. MCDILL, will occupy the chair to-night as Speaker pro tempore.

JOHN B. CHAPMAN.

Mr. RAINEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2786) for the relief of John B. Chapman; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the House now take a recess.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. MCDILL, of Wisconsin, in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House the session this evening will be for debate only upon the bill to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAVENS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HAVENS. Mr. Speaker, for many months the country has been impatiently waiting for action by this Congress upon the subject of the finances. It is the question above all others before us in magnitude and importance, and engages the profound attention and deep solicitude of all classes and conditions of our population.

In the midst of ample opportunities and unbounded providential favors the mistakes of the Government in its financial policies have scattered suffering and distress among the people. Those mistakes have clogged the channels of trade, thrown laborers out of employment, filled honest debtors with apprehension and alarm, and cast a withering blight over all the industries of the people. Whether the causes which have produced the existing stagnation and disorder are to remain, whether the mistakes that are robbing capital of its opportunities and labor of its just rewards are to continue, are questions that we are urged to answer by prompt and decisive action.

Wide and irreconcilable differences, however, as to the causes of the prevailing evils, and as to the measures necessary to remove them, embarrass us at every step and delay the success of measures designed to meet the monetary wants of the country. Expansion of the paper currency on the one hand, and contraction and specie payments on the other, are supported by their respective advocates with a zeal and ability worthy of the great interests involved, and the conflict between them will only terminate when every advantage has been tried and every argument exhausted.

SPECIE PAYMENTS NOT PRACTICABLE.

Mr. Speaker, I am firmly convinced that the only substantial relief that can be secured to the country at this time must come through an increase of the paper currency, and what I shall say will be intended to maintain the correctness of this view of our financial necessities. I do not believe that a resumption of specie payments is either practicable or possible at this time or in the immediate future. The premium which gold commands is occasioned by other causes than a redundancy of paper currency. Its scarcity in our markets and the foreign demand for it are the chief causes of its present price. Our national debt is largely held in Europe; large amounts of railroad and other corporation bonds are also in the hands of European capitalists, and the interest upon these obligations, amounting to about $65,000,000 per annum, is required to be paid in gold. The balance of trade is also heavily against us, requiring many millions more to make our annual settlements abroad. The result is that the quantity of gold in the country has for several years been steadily decreasing, so that it is not here in sufficient volume to redeem greenbacks and become a circulating medium among the people. For all practical uses it long ago ceased to circulate as money, and became simply an article of merchandise. Its value is regulated by the supply and demand precisely as the price of the breadstuffs we export is regulated. We are practically in the market buying it to meet our obligations abroad, at values regulated by the supply at hand and the degree of our necessities, just as we would buy any other article of merchandise we had promised to deliver. Our greenbacks do not lack public faith and confidence, but so long as all the gold that can be obtained at high premiums must be sent to Europe to pay an indebtedness there, we cannot redeem our paper with it nor supply it as a currency for practical use among the people. Our entire supply of gold flows continuously out of the country, in obedience to demands upon us that we cannot evade, and any legislation to stop it and compel a resumption of specie payments would be as ineffectual as a legislative enactment to compel water to run up hill.

The true road to specie payments does not lie in the direction of violent measures to compel resumption. It is to be found in legislation that will aid in the discharge of foreign indebtedness and the development of our industries so that foreign commerce shall not annually show a balance against us. Legislation that will develop the resources of the country, improve the prosperity of the people, and correct our business relations with foreign countries is the best that can be done to hasten the return of specie payments. Let this be the direction of our efforts, and our foreign obligations will be discharged or transferred to our own citizens and the balance of trade turned in our favor. We can then resume specie payments, for our gold will not be owned abroad and be called for and carried away by remorseless creditors as fast as we can obtain it.

The assumption that our paper is less valuable than gold because there is too much of it is a most grievous error, and is the source of many evils that are afflicting the people. Those who entertain this opinion do not recognize that there can be any other cause for what they call the depreciation of our paper, and stubbornly refuse to look further. I maintain, sir, that no country having the usual and proper paper circulation can maintain specie payments while being drained of its gold by foreign demands and the operations of an unfavorable commerce. The history of the suspension of the Bank of England, which began in 1797 and continued during twenty-five years, is proof of this assertion. At the time that suspension began the paper circulation of the bank was less than it had been at any time during the preceding ten years. There had been no overissue of paper. Why was it depreciated? It was because the political and commercial relations of England with the nations of the Continent had carried her gold there and left her without the means of payment. The gold in the vaults of the bank had sunk to about one-sixth of its usual volume. There was no redundancy of paper, but its redemption became impossible; and though its volume was contracted within its usual limits, there could still be no payment, for there was no gold with which to pay, and suspension became inevitable. Repeated efforts to force resumption proved disastrous failures, leaving no other effects behind than wrecks of business and universal suffering and distress among the people. And it was not until the end of twenty-five years, and when England had recovered from the effects of her continental wars and restored her commerce to a healthful condition, that the flow of gold returned to her vaults. Then, and not till then, did the most extraordinary and determined efforts to effect resumption prove successful. It came in its natural time, and all measures to force it before merely exhibited the folly of attempting to make impossibilities possible by legislative decree.

The proposition I have made is also shown to be true by the present financial condition of the countries of Europe. In four or five of the most prominent of them specie payments have long been suspended. The debts of these countries are held abroad and their gold goes abroad to pay interest. On the contrary, every country whose debt is held by its own citizens has an abundance of gold and maintains specie payments. There is no mystery about it; and those who travel beyond the plain common-sense rules of every-day business life in search of some profound and mysterious principle which governs the movements of specie will only become bewildered and lost. The farmer who may have contracted away his whole crop of wheat will have none left for his own use; and so the Government that has contracted to pay its whole supply of gold abroad will have none left for use at home. And this is exactly our condition now. The unwillingness to recognize this fact, and persistence in the idea that a return to specie payments is a matter of mere discretion and not dependent on the conditions which ordinarily determine the capacity of the debtor, have led to a great deal of folly and to serious mistakes in the discussion and direction of the financial measures of the Government.

A distinguished financier, and one who holds a responsible and influential position in shaping legislation upon this subject, recently stated that the premium upon gold was "conclusive" evidence that there was too much paper. And he stated that there was "no mode of testing how much money is needed to do the business of a country except that amount which can be maintained at par in gold." This is an assumption that the gold market always remains the same, and that it is never affected by the influences which advance and depress the values of all other commodities. Wheat, cotton, and corn advance when the supply is small and demand for exportation great; but according to this theory the same conditions would not affect the local value of gold. No matter how small the quantity may be, nor how inevitable its flow out of the country, its value will remain the same. No matter how small its volume may be, the true test of "how much money is needed to do the business of the country is still the amount that can be maintained at par with it." Of course it follows that when the supply of gold is small, and foreign creditors are demanding it and taking it abroad, it would maintain at par the same volume of currency that it would if the supply were great, and the flow into the country instead of out. And, finally, I suppose that if we were so far bankrupted as to possess but a solitary eagle, that nimble piece would be sufficient at all times and places for the redemption of all the currency necessary to do the business of this great country; it would still be the true medium for testing the financial requirement of the people.

Mr. Speaker, if this opinion had not been uttered by one so distinguished for ability, and if I did not know that it is entertained and urged by very many other able men, I should think I might safely pronounce it absurd and ridiculous.

I do not question that resumption can be effected by contraction; but I do say that contraction to a sufficient extent to produce this result would silence our factories, destroy trade, and impoverish half the people. If the so-called depreciation of the paper currency were due entirely to its redundancy, the degree of contraction necessary to bring about resumption would not be very great and the consequences not very serious. But as it is, to say the least, largely on account of the deficiency of specie and the foreign demand for it, contraction would be required to a sufficient extent to force gold into use in spite of its scarcity and of its flow abroad. The redeemable paper currency that might be maintained under ordinary circumstances could not be maintained in the present condition of our gold supply. The ability to redeem depends upon the means at hand for redemption. The limited amount of gold that we are able to keep in the country at this time would be sufficient to redeem only a small volume of paper—far smaller than might be maintained at a specie basis if we were not required to send our gold abroad to discharge foreign obligations. Contraction, therefore, sufficient to force the people to transact their business with the little specie we might be able to hold and the small quantity of paper it would maintain at a specie basis, would be very great. Its effect would be disastrous. It would involve a shrinkage of values that would produce a general collapse of business. Thousands of our best citizens would be brought face to face with ruin, while thousands more—laborers of every class thrown out of employment—would become suppliants for charity to save their wives and children from suffering and starvation.

Who can demonstrate that if under existing circumstances our paper were reduced to one-half its present amount the Government could resume and maintain specie payments? The supply of gold would not be increased thereby, nor would the necessity for sending it abroad be reduced a single dollar. Individuals who are without money do not pay their obligations, and this is just as true of Governments. And those who are so clamorous for specie payments should inform us where the Government could obtain the gold to redeem its greenbacks, even though they were contracted largely within their present volume. It can only pay what it owes abroad by buying gold with its promises at high premiums; how could it also redeem those promises at home with gold at par with its greenbacks? It might do so at some possible point in the course of contraction, but it would be when the country was involved in universal disaster. No such contraction would be tolerated, and to talk of it is a waste of time. To experiment in that direction would be to unnecessarily oppress the people.

THE PRESENT CIRCULATION TOO SMALL.

If, then, resumption is impossible, or if it is at this time impracticable, what is our duty? Is it not clearly to supply the people with a sufficient amount of paper currency for the transaction of business? We should carefully consider whether the assumption that the circulation is now too large, and that any addition to it would be followed by an unnatural inflation of prices, is true or false. A comparison of our present circulation with that of former periods and of other countries may aid us in determining this question. On the 1st of January, 1860, the bank circulation, as shown by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Chase, in his report of 1861–'62, was $207,000,000. In the same report he estimated the total amount of gold in the country on the 1st of October, 1861, at between $275,000,000 and $300,000,000. It is therefore reasonable to estimate the gold in 1860 at $285,000,000, as the volume certainly did not increase during the following year. Thus we find that there was a total circulation of $492,000,000; this does not include silver, of which there must have been several millions. Omitting the slave population, which then occupied only a property relation to the business of the country, and there was a circulation per capita of $17.90. And this was less than it had been at any time during the preceding eight years. In 1854, according to the most reliable estimates as to the amount of gold in the country, the circulation per capita was about $20; in 1856, $19.75; in 1857, $20.50; and in 1859, $18.50. In these estimates I have included the gold in the banks and in the Treasury, and have omitted the slave population.

On the 1st of October last the total circulation was $752,000,000. If the increase of population since the enumeration of 1870 has kept pace with the average rate during the previous twenty years, it is now considerably in excess of forty-two millions. Estimating it at that amount we find that the circulation per capita was at that date $17.90. This includes the national-bank reserves. If we deduct those reserves and take only the amount actually in circulation among the people, which, as stated by the Comptroller of the Currency in his late report, was on the 1st of November last $631,000,000, there was then an actual circulation per capita of $15.02.

It will be observed that the circulation per capita for several years previous to the war was considerably larger than it is at this time. But there are other facts to be considered, also, which demonstrate still more forcibly the insufficiency of the present volume of currency. In 1860 our wealth was $16,159,616,068; the ratio of circulation to wealth was 3.05 per cent. In 1870 the wealth of the people had advanced to $30,068,918,507; and if the rate of increase maintained during the twenty years preceding the census of 1870 has been maintained since that time the wealth of the country now exceeds $40,000,000,000. But for safety let us estimate it at only $35,000,000,000; and at this estimate the ratio of circulation is only 2.12 per cent., or nearly one-third less than in 1860. If we omit the reserves and take the actual circulation as stated by the Comptroller, we find the ratio to be only 1.80 per cent.

A comparison of our circulation with that of other countries shows the insufficiency of ours in a still more glaring light. Let us take the three leading countries of Europe—England, Germany, and France. Authorities recognized as correct, which I believe are not questioned at all, show the total circulation of England to be $855,230,550, and the per capita circulation $26.87; that of Germany is $1,091,000,000, and the per capita circulation $26.60. Authorities do not agree as to the circulation of France, but the lowest estimate from creditable sources is $1,250,000,000, showing a per capita circulation of $34.62. In each case the reserves have been omitted, and these statements show the actual circulation. The per capita circulation in this country, omitting the reserves, I have shown to be only $15.02—less than half that of France, and only a little more than half that of either England or Germany.

I have not the means of ascertaining correctly the amount of circulation in the other nations of Europe, but it is undoubtedly correct to say that our people are supplied with less money for the transaction of their business than any other civilized people on the globe.

It will scarcely be claimed that our people do not require more money than those of either France, England, or Germany, though we upply them with materially less. There the great mass of the people are poorly paid for their labor and use but little money. Here our entire population are actively engaged in pursuits requiring the constant use of money. Our laborers are better paid. They wear better and more expensive clothing and eat better and more expensive food. They spend more in the education of their children and for all the comforts and enjoyments of life. The volume of money necessary to pay, clothe, and feed a thousand laborers in either France or England would not be half sufficient here. The great mass of our people—our agriculturists and mechanics—stand upon a higher plane of humanity than the poverty-doomed masses of those countries, and have a thousand wants unknown to them. The price of labor and the cost of living are more than 100 per cent. greater here than there, and yet our people are supplied with less money with which to meet their varied necessities and carry on the pursuits of their lives than those populations.

Again, we are developing new country, opening mines, building railroads, erecting factories, and in unnumbered directions have demands for money which are not felt in the old and finished countries of Europe. There the territorial extent is small and the populations very dense. The convenience of making exchanges is thereby greatly facilitated. Almost every man in England lives within sight of a bank, while our vast territorial extent and the sparseness of population in most of the States render these facilities impossible, and the use of actual money necessary for the transaction of the local business of the people. An ambitious and vigorous population like ours, with untold opportunities about them, may prosper in spite of great hinderances; but that they require greater financial facilities for the proper transaction of business than the quiet, sleepy population of the older countries, will hardly be questioned.

I have shown that our present circulation is less in proportion to either wealth or population than that of 1860; yet is it not evident that we require more? The South then had but one great industry, and that was controlled by a small class whose system of business was such as to require the use of but little actual money. Now small operators are taking their places, and multiplied demands for money for daily uses are everywhere felt. Her interests are becoming more diversified; factories are springing into existence, railroads are being built, and new commercial interests being developed. Where there was before but a single great industry, there are to-day a thousand channels into which money, the life-blood of trade and commerce, must flow, to give strength and vitality to varied industries and commercial pursuits. The volume of currency that was sufficient for the South of 1860 would be utterly insufficient for the South of to-day. The development of manufacturing, mining, and other industries throughout the North and West have also increased the general necessities in the same direction. Examine the marvelous growth of manufactures from 1860 to 1870, and explain, if you can, how industries that have doubled in their extent can be conducted with a currency that stands to-day near where it stood when that growth began. With the diversification of new pursuits and the extraordinary growth of old ones, multiplying the necessities for increased facilities for rapid exchanges, the volume of circulation is now less per capita than in 1860, and in proportion to wealth is one-third less.

Testing the amount of money necessary for the uses of our people as I have done, we find a very material deficiency. But before our eyes everywhere is evidence of the same fact that cannot be mistaken. The building of railroads has ceased, cities no longer maintain their accustomed growth, farms are not being improved, factories are not springing into life, emigration is checked in its march to the West, clouds are lowering over honest debtors, and all material growth and progress are arrested. The scant supplies of currency are scarcely sufficient for the uses of the great money centers and are, of course, held and controlled by them, while the ordinary industries of the people are in sickly stages and pleading for nourishment. The necessary operations of trade go on; but that enterprise which develops the resources of the country, creates its wealth, and leads the advance in material progress, is utterly repressed and inactive. These facts are before our very eyes, and no veil of flattering theories can obscure them.

THE CHARACTER OF OUR CURRENCY.

But, Mr. Speaker, our paper is sneeringly termed an "irredeemable currency," and history is continually invoked to show the danger of tolerating an "irredeemable currency." Writers upon political economy are quoted to show that an "irredeemable currency" encourages speculation, inflates prices, and finally leads to collapse and ruin. The results of stamping paper and base metals and calling them money are triumphantly presented as a warning against the toleration of our "irredeemable currency." Experiments where floods of paper issued, with no purpose or ability to redeem, have resulted in financial disasters are appealed to as proof that certain disaster lurks in the "irredeemable" greenback. Sir, those who hope to influence our action in this way ought to see that there are two material facts wanting to make their argument applicable to the present case. In every case so referred to, and in every case that can be referred to, the money so issued was issued in redundant quantities, and there was neither the purpose nor the ability to redeem it; in some instances there was not even a worthless promise to redeem. The public had no confidence in it, and it depreciated and became worthless as an inevitable consequence. It depreciated not because it was not to be redeemed at a particular time, but because it was not to be redeemed at all, and the people knew it, and because it existed in redundant quantities. It had no intrinsic value and no ultimate prospect of redemption, and hence it was utterly worthless. There was nothing in it nor behind it to give it value. That unsteady and fluctuating values, reckless gambling and speculation, and final collapse and ruin, should result from such a currency was most natural.

But to compare our paper currency with this sort of stuff is unjust and inexcusable. It seems like a frantic attempt to degrade and dishonor the money of the country, for which there is no justification whatever.

What is the "irredeemable stuff" that is so much sneered at, and which the people are so earnestly cautioned to beware of by the advocates of certain theories? Did the people of this country ever have any other paper currency in which they had so much faith and confidence? Does anybody doubt it, or the Government that stands behind it? In the midst of panic and disaster that would have prostrated the old State banks and made their notes worthless, spreading disaster wider and farther, our paper was almost the only thing in which confidence remained unshaken. It was sought after and hoarded as something which, in the midst of general uncertainty and wreck, would remain unaffected and sound. Why was this so? Were our wisest business men as well as the common people so grievously misled by what certain theorists have suddenly discovered to be "irredeemable stuff;" or may it not be that the theorists have mistaken the facts? The money of China, to which prominent reference has been made in connection with this subject, was practically repudiated. It was not even received for dues to the government that issued it. The French assignats were used as "wall-paper for the cottages of the peasants." The money of John Law was equally as worthless. The confederate paper depreciated as the fortunes of the confederate government waned and the hope of redemption was destroyed. In all these, and in every other case that has been cited to depreciate and disgrace our paper, there was scarcely a pretense of redemption, and the people knew that there could be no redemption. There was nothing to give the notes credit, and they sank to the value of waste paper. Such is not the condition of our currency. The Government stands behind it, and although it cannot redeem its notes at this time, everybody has faith in its ultimate ability and in its good purposes. Every dollar of property in the country is pledged for its redemption. No other credit is so good as that of the Government to-day, and hence in the test of a severe panic the currency suffered no shock amid the general depreciation of credit values. When the people lose confidence in the ability of the Government, or in its intention to redeem its promises we shall begin to suffer from the evils of an "irredeemable currency," and not before. In no just or proper sense can the currency of the country at this time be called irredeemable. Certainly it is not irredeemable in the sense in which the worthless issues to which we are so frequently referred were irredeemable; for they were without the prospect of redemption at any time, and their worthlessness resulted from this fact.

A condition of specie payments is something that always exists a great deal more in theory than in fact. The banks of this country maintained specie payments before the days of greenbacks so long as specie was not demanded and no longer. Everybody knew that it was impossible for the banks to redeem all of their notes in specie at any particular time, and that demand for payment involved suspension. But confidence in their ability ultimately to redeem their obligations upheld the credit of their notes and made them useful for all purposes of business. It is in a great degree the same with our paper currency now. The Government may not approach as near to actual specie payments as the banks then did, but confidence in its ultimate ability to redeem its promises and faith in its integrity give value to its notes and make them desirable as a circulating medium.

Again, the uniformity of our currency, the difficulty of counterfeiting it, as well as its undoubted safety, have rendered it exceedingly popular with the people. Their appreciation of it is also strengthened by the painful recollections of the times when under the irregular and inconsistent banking laws of nearly forty States constant vigilance was necessary in order to avoid being imposed upon by counterfeits and the issues of broken banks, and when the current money of a given State would often be refused for the price of a breakfast in another. The familiar color of the greenback disarms suspicion as to its value, and the money of Wall street circulates also without question among the humblest citizens of the remotest parts of our extended territory. It cannot truthfully be said that the value of such a currency is fluctuating and unstable. Gold may command a premium, but it is not on account of any defect in the currency itself. Gold is not a circulating medium, but is a commodity bought and sold in our markets for specific purposes, and the value of which is regulated by the law of supply and demand, while our paper is almost the only thing which remains fixed and stable. The fluctuating premiums upon gold only indicate the fluctuations in the supply and demand, just as the ever-varying price of wheat indicates the condition of the market rather than the value of the money with which it is purchased; and it would be just as unfair to say that the paper currency is depreciated and unstable because at one time it will not purchase as much wheat or corn as at another, as it is to say that it is depreciated because at one time it will not purchase as much gold as at another. When gold becomes more plentiful and the demand for it abroad is not so great, it will become cheaper, just as any other article of merchandise would under the same circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, are the doleful theories of those who speak with so much contempt of our "irredeemable" currency sustained by the experience of the country? During the last twelve years we have had no other. Have we realized any of the baleful consequences that are paraded before us as a solemn warning against its continuance? Has our paper proved to be no better than the unsecured issues of irresponsible and dishonest authority with which it is compared? Sir, during this period the country has prospered and grown in an unparalled degree. In all that indicates material progress and development the history of the world shows nothing to compare with it. The products of our factories have doubled in their extent, railroads have been pushed wherever civilization has gone, vast territory has been peopled and cities built, marvelous mineral riches have been developed, trade and commerce have expanded, and all the industries of the people have multiplied and flourished beyond anything ever before known. And, sir, this has not been fictitious and speculative prosperity, but substantial and enduring growth. The figures of the census of 1870 tell a story that upsets all the theories that can be advanced to teach that a people cannot prosper except under the delusion of what is termed specie payments.

It should be remembered, also, that during a portion of the period to which I am referring eleven States were being wasted by war, and the whole people subjected to burdens of taxation to which they had before been strangers. It was shown the other day by the figures presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that the amount of taxes collected from 1862 to 1872 in customs duties, internal revenue, and direct taxes exceeded largely all the collections from the same sources during all the previous years from the foundation of the Government. And yet, sir, the people sustained this burden and prospered in all their enterprises and industries as they had never before done. And all this was accomplished with a currency that is now termed "irredeemable," dangerous, and disgraceful.

Mr. Speaker, it has been demonstrated that the people may prosper in the use of this currency. It is not its character from which they are now suffering, but from the mistaken policy of contraction which has deprived them of a sufficient volume of it to carry on the business of the country; and the only relief that can be afforded is by an increase of its volume until specie circulation becomes possible.

THE INFLATION SCARE CROW.

But, Mr. Speaker, when we advocate an increase of currency we are met with the accusation that we are inflationists; and labored efforts are made to enlighten us as to the consequences of too large a volume of currency. History is paraded before us and the authority of learned writers is brought into requisition to teach us that inflation is a dangerous thing. But a great deal of research and hard labor expended in this generous work might be saved. I am sure that there are others besides the advocates of contraction who know what a redundancy of currency involves, and that they are just as far from inviting its evil influences. The issue is not upon this point, and the attempt to force it there is a confession of weakness upon the real issue.

What is inflation? That is the question to which gentlemen should direct their attention, rather than to the preparation of learned essays upon an evil which nobody would encourage. Show us that what we advocate is in fact inflation, and the victory will be yours. I have already shown that the volume of circulation is far less in proportion to wealth and population than at former periods, when it is not pretended that we had too much. I have also shown that it is materially less in the same proportion than that of other civilized countries where inflation is not dreamed of; and I have also shown that the necessities of our people require more money than those of other countries. With what propriety, then, are we charged with favoring inflation, when all that we ask would not supply our people with as much money as is supplied to the people of France or England, or in fact to the people of any of the leading civilized nations of the earth?

But it is not insisted that a larger aggregate volume might not properly be issued if the paper currency were redeemable, but because it is "irredeemable" it is dangerous to issue it in the volume that would otherwise be proper. Those who hold this view do so upon the theory that our currency is of the same character as the worthless issues which I have before spoken of—issues that nobody was responsible for and that everybody knew were not to be redeemed. This is the great error of their argument, for there is no ground for comparison between the two as I think I have shown. A currency only temporarily irredeemable, and in the value of which the people have full confidence, does not necessarily inflate prices and stimulate reckless speculation and gambling. It can only do so when issued in superfluous quantities; and these consequences will follow too great a supply of gold just as certainly as they will follow too great a supply of sound paper. This we lately witnessed in Germany, where wild speculation followed the accumulation of an unusual amount of gold. Too much money, whether it be paper or gold, will advance prices and excite unhealthful speculation. The irredeemability of our currency is therefore no argument against the issuing of as great a volume of it as the experience of mankind and our own judgments teach us is necessary to do the business of the country. Until we should go beyond the amount required for healthful business prosperity there would be no other depreciation of the paper than that occasioned by the scarcity of gold, and which is apparent rather than real. Neither fluctuating values nor reckless speculation would follow any more than if the same volume of gold were in circulation. Beyond that point nobody desires to go. In fact, taking the experience of our own and other countries as the test of how much money is needed, the advocates of an increase of the present volume are willing to stop far short of that point.

THE VALUE OF MONEY.

It has been earnestly insisted that any increase of the volume of currency necessarily decreases its value. If the amount of our currency were $300,000,000, and we should increase it to $600,000,000, we are told that the inevitable laws of finance would render each dollar worth only half of its previous value. If this is true it applies just as completely to an increase of gold as to an increase of paper, and it is just as forcible an argument in favor of limiting the volume of gold as it is in favor of limiting the amount of sound paper. And if it proves the point which it is intended to establish, it proves that the amount of money in circulation is a matter of no consequence—a small volume by its greater value being equivalent to any larger volume—the purchasing power increasing as the volume diminishes. But the proposition is inaccurate and unsafe as a basis for practical legislation.

It is undoubtedly true that the values of many kinds of property depend greatly upon the amount of money in circulation. But a very small increase beyond the amount necessary for legitimate uses may excite the wildest speculation, and carry fictitious and fluctuating values far beyond the limits of the rule that is quoted as infallible. And this is admitted by those who rely upon it when they paint the bottomless ruin of a redundant currency. And so a slight contraction within the volume necessary for healthful business may clog up the channels of trade and produce such disorder as to unsettle business and depreciate the value of property far out of the proportion indicated by the rule. Again, the values of many kinds of property—especially that in which the commerce of the world is carried on—are regulated by the markets of the world; they are dependent upon the general monetary condition of commercial countries rather than upon that of the particular place where such property may be offered for sale. It is, therefore, plain that the rule so confidently asserted cannot operate without the concurrence of many conditions that are practically impossible.

AN INSUFFICIENT CURRENCY MAKES THE RICH RICHER AND THE POOR POORER.

Mr. Speaker, in every country there is somewhere a point beyond which the volume of money cannot safely pass, and below which it cannot go without materially affecting the business interests of the people. And it is the duty of those who control financial measures to ascertain that point and approach it as near as possible. In my judgment the true point is the highest one that can be reached without stimulating reckless speculation, stock-gambling, and fictitious values. The reduction of the volume of money below that point is unjust to the masses of the people and injurious to the best interests of any country. Reduce the volume, and you reduce the price of labor and also the values of many species of property in at least equal proportion. I believe that in consequence of the crippling of the machinery for business operations the price of labor would be reduced in a much greater degree, and so of many kinds of property; and unfortunately it would be the property of the common people. The notes and bonds of the capitalist would not shrink one dollar in amount, but would in fact be increased in value. The little possessions of the people, the productions of the mechanic and the agriculturist, however, would not escape.

Under such conditions the distinctions between the rich and poor are made more distinct and significant; the rich are made richer and the poor poorer. The little money that circulates is only sufficient for the wants of wealthy operators, and is so controlled by them that the poor see but little of it. The business of the country is subjected to the payment of ruinous rates of interest to the money-lenders, and is crippled and embarrassed by their exactions. A small volume of money is emphatically the rich man's money. It increases his power and destroys the independence and prosperity of the masses. Labor poorly compensated and deprived of its opportunities is humiliated and degraded, while wealth, never merciful, rejoices in its exaltation, and laughs at the misery upon which it fattens. Thus the aristocracy of wealth becomes more clearly defined, and the weakness of poverty more glaring and helpless.

Sir, no sophistry can disguise the fact that this is an issue between the moneyed aristocracy of the country on the one hand and the people on the other. Contraction or an insufficient volume of money means that the business of the country shall be forced to supplicate the banks and other money-lenders for loans at exorbitant rates of interest made possible by their necessities. It means that the industries upon which the laboring classes are dependent for employment and just remuneration shall only move at the will of the capitalist, and upon the oppressive terms that he may dictate. It means cheap labor, self-denial, and destitution among the people, and absolute power in the hands of the money-lenders over all the interests of the country.

Sir Archibald Alison, in his "England in 1815 and 1845, or a Sufficient and a Contracted Currency," shows that an insufficient currency, by the depression of prices and the diminution of profits, breaks down small dealers, and gives a monopoly of the markets to the large capitalists. He says:

> The period of a contraction of the currency and consequent fall in the money prices of all the articles of human consumption is one in which great profits are sure to be realized by the larger capitalists, and great losses sustained by the smaller. The former prosper because the magnitude of their transactions enables them to realize a handsome income upon the whole from a declining and at length almost inconceivably small amount of profit from each transaction; and they gradually get the monopoly of the market in their own line of business by the extinction of the lesser capitalists whom the fall in the price of commodities has ruined or the diminished profits have repelled from entering into competition with them. * * * Small traders, therefore, and farmers without capital are speedily ruined in such a state of things, and the laboring or destitute condition is only rendered the more distressing by the contrast which it affords to the wealth and splendor with which the holders of large capital in the same line of business are surrounded. * * * A period of contracted currency is one of embarrassment, difficulty, and generally in the end of insolvency to the small farmer and moderate land-holder.
> If a supply proportioned to the increase of men and the wants of their commercial intercourse is not afforded, the circulating medium will become scarce; it will rise in price from that scarcity, and become accessible only to the more rich and affluent classes. The industrious poor, or those engaged in business but possessed of small capital, will be the first to suffer.

The same author says that, "the contraction of the currency which was unnecessarily made to accompany the resumption of cash payments by the bill of 1819" was the cause of incalculable evil. The agricultural and laboring classes were ruined. Wages sank "so low that they barely sufficed with the great bulk of workers, especially females, for the support of existence." "From 1826 to 1835," he says, "the table of the House of Commons literally groaned under the load of petitions praying for relief to agricultural distress." At the same time the wealthy classes were unusually prosperous. The "co-existence of so much suffering in one portion of the people with so much prosperity in another," he says, "was unparalleled in the history of the world." And this was the result of an insufficient currency—of contraction, which Alison says was "unnecessarily made to accompany the resumption of specie payments."

But those who advocate a reduction of the currency insist that no injury would result to the laboring classes; that if the price of their labor is reduced the prices of what they must purchase are correspondingly reduced, so that their condition is not affected. This is an old argument, and has been used to justify many wrongs. Those who use it, however, can but know that it is utterly false and unwarranted. The prices of the necessities which the laborer must purchase would not be reduced in the proportion that his compensation might be reduced. Such was never the case in any country, and never can be. In the purchase of what his wants require he comes in competition with the wealthy classes, and must submit to prices largely regulated in their interests; the prices of much that he must buy are controlled by the markets of the world, and not by the markets in the particular locality where he may live, nor by the circumstances that degrade his labor. If the rewards of labor were reduced one-half in this country at this time, through contraction, does any sane man suppose that tea and coffee would or could be sold at one-half their present prices, or that any other article imported from abroad, or that we now export, would be so reduced? No reasonable man will assert such a thing. The operation of the law of supply and demand is also constantly affecting the prices of his necessities and rendering uncertain the cost of living, while no corresponding fluctuations in the price of his labor protect him against this disadvantage—a disadvantage, too, which his meager wages furnish him no margin to meet.

The advocates of cheap labor are very careful not to direct the attention of those whom they would delude to the condition of the laboring classes of Europe, but prefer to rely solely upon their theories. There we have a practical illustration of the effects of cheap labor which puts all their false theories and plausible arguments to utter rout. It is there demonstrated that the necessaries of life do not cheapen with the price of labor, and that the condition of the laboring classes is degraded and miserable just in the proportion that the price of their labor is reduced. In nearly every country of Europe the laboring classes live in the most stinted manner, and yet there is absolutely no margin between the cost of living and the price of their labor out of which they can hope to save anything with which to acquire homes and independence. The broad line which separates them from the wealthy classes is never crossed, and they live out their lives without even the hope of rising above the condition in which they were born. This is cheap labor, compensated by the cheap necessaries of life that we are assured of.

Mr. Speaker, I trust that no legislation will characterize Congress now or hereafter which looks to the cheapening of the rewards of labor. The condition of the working people of this country is that which most distinguishes it from all other countries and is its highest glory; and any measure designed to cheapen labor would be most unfortunate and mistaken. All arguments and theories used to convince the laboring classes that a reduction of the price of their labor can be compensated for by cheaper necessaries of life are delusive and fraudulent. They have their origin in that spirit which, since the world began, has ever prompted wealth to encroach upon the rights of labor, and to magnify its splendor and power by degrading everything below it.

Sir, I am opposed to any increase of the currency that would unsettle values and inflate prices; but within that limit I am in favor of such a volume of circulation as will enable the poor to share it with the rich. It is the common people who are suffering to-day and not the wealthy classes, just as they must always be the sufferers when the volume of money is too small. They are dependent upon the prosperity of the industries that give them employment for their daily support, while the wealthy can enjoy their accumulations in spite of the causes that deprive the working classes of their reliance. The demand for more currency is therefore most important to the common people, and should only be resisted by those who are resolved to regard the interests of the few rather than the welfare of the many.

MORE PAPER THE ONLY REMEDY.

Mr. Speaker, the evils which have been depicted as resulting from an "irredeemable currency" cannot result from such a currency as ours; and it is the duty of the Government while assuming to control the volume of circulation to authorize the issue of as much as the legitimate business of the country would require if every dollar of it were gold. It is all that we have and all that we can have. Many years are likely to elapse before we shall reach the solid ground of specie payments. In the mean time shall the business of the country be crippled and all growth and progress retarded by abortive and futile attempts to accomplish something which all experience and reason show us to be at this time impossible? Under similar circumstances England was a quarter of a century in getting back to specie payments, though she resorted to more extreme measures to force resumption than are urged in this country now; and many more years are likely to elapse than some of us have fondly hoped before we shall be able to do so. And during the uncertain period that is to intervene there can be no wisdom in refusing to put in circulation the best currency at our command in sufficient volume to meet the legitimate demands of business. Because we cannot have just such currency as we most desire, we should not stubbornly refuse the best that is within our reach. The time to talk of reducing the paper currency will be when we have replenished our supply of gold and so improved our relations with foreign countries that we can keep it at home to supply the place of paper currency. In advance of that time the withholding of a proper volume of currency would only oppress and embarrass the people without effecting any good results whatever.

But it is said that the Government is breaking its pledges, that it is acting in bad faith in not redeeming its greenbacks. And we are daily given solemn moral lessons upon the subject of broken promises, which would be exceedingly impressive but for the use sought to be made of them. What are these broken promises and acts of bad faith about which men are so much concerned? The Government promised to redeem when it could, and the people so understood its promises when they accepted them.

Mr. MELLISH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right here in the line of his argument?

Mr. HAVENS. I will.

Mr. MELLISH. I would ask the gentleman, if the Government receive legal-tenders at par value for taxes and custom dues, a large portion every year, is it not proper to consider that a virtual redemption, and indeed a better redemption than was in operation under the old so-called specie-basis system?

Mr. HAVENS. I would call that redemption. It is taking up the obligations of the Government; and, certainly, to that extent it is a redemption of them.

Mr. MELLISH. It takes them up dollar for dollar.

Mr. HAVENS. The Government promised to redeem when it could, and the people so understood its promises when they accepted them. They recognize that it is not able to redeem them now, and they are not urging payment. On the contrary, they are protesting against any attempt at immediate payment. They are rather eager to accept more of the so-called broken promises. The people are responsible for the Government; it is theirs, and the consequences of its errors fall upon them. They understand that redemption can only be effected at this time by disastrous contraction; and if they do not clamor for payment at such a sacrifice, who ought to complain? If they desire to offer an extension, is it dishonorable for the Government to avail itself of the opportunity? Promises extended by such agreement and for mutual interests ought certainly not to be regarded as broken or dishonored, and the moral stigma sought to be cast upon them is simply absurd and unreasonable.

THE NECESSITIES OF THE WEST.

Mr. Speaker, I speak what I believe to be the judgment of four-fifths of the people of the West when I urge the expediency of measures to effect an increase of the paper circulation. The people of the West are heavily in debt. They have pushed forward civilization into new regions, have built cities, constructed railroads, improved farms, developed mines, and inaugurated all the great enterprises characteristic of an ambitious and energetic population. Their progress in material growth is the marvel of the age, and has no parallel in history. But they have operated with limited means, and largely upon credits. They are struggling to discharge obligations incurred in building an empire out of a wilderness. You can easily crush them. You can give their farms to merciless creditors, and destroy the hopes of tens of thousands built up by years of honest industry and toil. The policy of contraction will do it. Stand still and refuse to supply the volume of currency which the experience of our own and of other countries shows to be necessary, and great suffering will follow all over the West. Standing still is contraction, for the growth of population and the demand of increased business are constantly absorbing the circulation we have.

You of the East, who feel secure in the accumulated wealth of a century, who have inherited ancestral estates, and who have succeeded to the well-built business of your fathers and to the farms and shops made ready for you by the labors of other hands than your own, may not fully appreciate the situation of those who have pushed out from your midst with no capital but their own courage and energy to carve out their fortunes in a new and undeveloped country. And before you refuse your assent to measures which they deem expedient, which they believe essential to protect them from business prostration and bankruptcy, you should carefully consider whether their appeal is not reasonable, and whether all that you hope to gain by your policy will compensate for the injury you will inflict upon them. You might possibly force specie payment before its natural time, but the shock would be disastrous to honest debtors all over the country; and in the West, especially, they constitute a very large class. I will not undertake to speak as to all parts of the West; but wherever I have been able to learn it I know that during the past three years, outside of the cities, all the money that could be obtained has been eagarly sought for at from 10 to 25 per cent. upon the best of securities. And this demand has not come from speculators and adventurers, but from men whose legitimate necessities have compelled them to borrow. And the situation has constantly been growing worse. The want of money is now severely and dangerously affecting all classes; and without the co-operation of the Government, by which relief can be obtained through the operation of wholesome and prudent legislation, a great deal of sore experience is in store for us.

WHO ARE ADVOCATES OF IMMEDIATE RESUMPTION.

Mr. Speaker, in times of financial suffering and distress those who happen to be fortunate enough to have money at their command can loan it at exorbitant rates of interest, and buy up the property of unfortunate debtors being sacrificed at the demands of inexorable creditors. These men are now advocates of contraction and resumption. Every bank seeking borrowers, every man with large deposits, and every money-shark waiting for opportunities to speculate out of the distress of others, is an advocate of the same policy. Go where you will, East or West, and every man watching about the court-houses for opportunities to buy his neighbor's property at sheriffs' sales at a fraction of its value, firmly believes that an immediate return to specie payments is the remedy for all financial evils. It is the men engaged in legitimate business who ask for more currency. The industrial and commercial classes everywhere feel the want of it; and neither vague apprehensions nor doubtful theories should stand in the way of legislation that will supply their necessities.

FREE BANKING NOT THE BEST REMEDY.

Mr. Speaker, the proposition for free banking contained in the pending bill does not seem to be the measure best calculated to remedy the existing evils. In my judgment the country is suffering from the unjust and unequal distribution of the national banking capital even more than from the insufficiency of the volume of circulation. Massachusetts, according to her wealth and population, is entitled to $19,239,000, and actually has $58,000,000; while Missouri should have $15,459,000, and actually has only $6,835,000. The first has more than three times her share, while the latter has less than half the amount to which she is entitled. Rhode Island, entitled to $2,750,000, has over $13,000,000, more than five times her share; while Texas, entitled to $4,695,000, has only $849,000. Connecticut has more than double her apportionment, while Arkansas has only one-tenth of hers. It is unnecessary, however, to specify further. Every Eastern and New England State has largely more than her just proportion of the national-bank circulation, while every Western and Southern State has less. Without taking from any State that which they already have, those States that are deficient should be allowed that to which they are fairly entitled. No more than simple justice would thus be done, and the country would be benefited by a material increase of the general circulation.

But we are told also that the location of more banks in the West would not benefit us; that the supply of currency would not thereby be increased in the Western States, because the notes of the banks would flow away and seek their level in the East where they are needed, and with those who are able to hold them. This proposition is entirely erroneous. The banks of the West would loan their money to customers in the West, by whom it would be repaid at short intervals. Necessity as well as convenience would compel the banks to use their money at home, and it could not to any great extent be permanently transferred to the East. Besides, the conversion of capital now otherwise employed into banking capital would increase the amount of loanable money, so that loans would be more readily obtained and exchanges more easily effected. The idle money in the hands of individuals, and which they do not desire to loan, gathers into the banks in the shape of deposits, and is by them loaned to the people for active uses. The amount of money thus thrown into active circulation through the agency of the banks is everywhere very great.

Again, money is attracted by the banks. Its tendency is to gather near them; so that the localities favored with abundant banks are often plethoric while the localities remote from them are destitute. And as the banks are now chiefly located in the East, and held there by law, the natural and inevitable tendency of money is to flow in that direction. And this is one of the greatest evils from which the West is now suffering. It has frequently happened that while the West has been destitute of money for legitimate uses there has been a superabundance of it in New York. The establishment of more banks in the West would have the effect to counteract this tendency. Every additional bank in the West would not only supply more money, but it would become a powerful influence in holding the money of the West at home where it belongs. The evils which we are told would operate to deprive us of the benefit of any increase of circulation can be most effectually destroyed by increasing the strength and power of the local money centers of the West through the establishment of additional banks. The influences which at this time cause money to flow eastward are not altogether legitimate and natural, but are largely speculative and artificial; and they are encouraged and fostered by the preponderating power of the banks in that locality. They gather up the money of the country as the hen gathers her chickens under her wings, and they do not permit it to stray beyond their motherly influence. Distribute the banks justly among the people and you will equalize the financial relations between the sections so as to check the tendency of money to accumulate in a particular locality. The Eastern States are now suffering from the prevailing distress far less than the West, not only because the law has given them a larger circulation of currency, but because the natural and necessary operations of the banks hold that circulation where it belongs.

It is not true that money necessarily flows where it is needed for legitimate uses. As water will rise above its level to fill an artificial vacuum so money may be forced out of its proper channels by artificial causes. The undue concentration of facilities for financial operations in any particular locality stimulates trade and speculation in that locality, and creates an unhealthful and artificial demand for money, which draws it away from the legitimate uses of farmers, mechanics, and small traders in the rural districts. Speculation is expected to return larger profits than are realized by the ordinary industries of the people, and it attracts with controlling influence the active money of the country. It is therefore the duty of the Government, in so far as it assumes to control the financial affairs of the country, to avoid the giving of undue facilities for financial operations to any particular locality. It should avoid the creation of artificial influences by which a portion of the people are to be made rich and the remainder deprived of the means of transacting their legitimate and necessary business. This it does not do while it gives to some of the States four or five times the amount of banking capital, upon the basis of wealth and population, that it gives to others. It is practically the robbery of one section for the benefit of another.

I have said that the country is suffering more from the inequality of circulation among the States than from the insufficiency of the aggregate volume. And I do not believe that free banking will correct this inequality. The capital of the East is in a shape to be invested in banking with greater facility than that of the West, and if the way is opened more new banks will be organized in the East than in the West, so that the present preponderance of banking facilities will be preserved. The tendency of banking operations, from speculative and other influences, is to concentrate in the East in undue proportion, and free banking opens the way for the unrestricted operation of this tendency. I shall therefore favor an amendment to this bill, if I can have the opportunity to do so, which will limit the increase of banking circulation and restrict it to the States that have less than their proportion. I would not ask the States that now have a surplus to surrender any portion of it; but in justice to the people of the West and South, and to the whole country, I would not permit them to increase what they have until the other States have approached something near the standard of equality with them.

I would favor the withdrawal of the national-bank circulation entirely, and the substitution of greenbacks. But this proposition receives little favor, and the bank circulation is certain to continue; I am therefore in favor of its equalization upon a just basis among the States.

Gentlemen from the East are unwilling to surrender any portion of the banking capital they have, and insist that they need it all. Doubtless they do; and if so why should they persist in denying to the West that which they claim to be necessary for their own business prosperity? They tell us the West is too poor to require more than she now has. If this is so she will not get more, whatever the law may permit. We only ask the amount which our wealth and population entitle us to. Upon this basis we ask equality; nothing more. Equalize the amount of capital authorized among the States upon a just basis. Do this, and if the West has no surplus capital to invest in banking there will be plenty of it in the East eager to go West to embrace the opportunities presented there for the profitable use of money in banking operations.

This measure, together with the legalization of the issue of the $44,000,000 reserve, making the total greenback circulation $400,000,000, would relieve the country from financial distress and restore business prosperity. And nothing less will meet the expectations of the people.

PARTY RESPONSIBILITY.

The party in power will be held responsible for mistakes and neglect in legislation, and it should heed the popular demand upon this subject if it would maintain its hold upon the public confidence. The suffering and distress occasioned by financial embarrassments is manifesting itself in a spirit of complaint against those who might have provided against the existing evils. The elections of last fall gave forth but the first faint indications of the discontent that is gathering. And we are sufficiently warned that in some way the people mean to be relieved from the evils under which they suffer—if not through the instrumentality of the republican party, then otherwise. You who look with apprehension upon the organization that has grown to be a power in the Western States, and is spreading its branches even into the heart of New England, and who believe that its tendency is to extremes, dangerous alike to those who composed it and to the whole country, must remember that the West has much to complain of; and that a people goaded to resentment are not always careful of the rights of those who have wronged them, and are liable to mix a spirit of revenge with their demands for justice.

Legislation that will remove the just causes of complaint and restore the people to business prosperity will also restore contentment and confidence in those in power. Without this the prevailing restlessness will continue to grow and gather force until in their just anger the people will sweep out of power the men who have refused to regard their distress or to harken to their appeals. Bankers, capitalists, money speculators of all kinds, are bringing to bear all their influence to mislead the public mind and to defeat legislation upon this subject. They are here in your committee-rooms, the resolutions of their meetings and caucuses are placed before us daily, and their petitions are flooding upon us; but let us not forget that behind them, and more potent than they, are the laboring classes and those engaged in the legitimate business of trade and commerce. They are not here. They have not the facilities for reaching us that are possessed by the representatives of money; but we know their wishes and should be careful that we are not diverted from regarding them by the unceasing appeals that are continually ringing in our ears. Let us not mistake the loud clamor of the money-changers for the voice of the people.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAVENS] takes his seat I would like to ask him a question. He has broached a theory which has been suggested in another place in the form of a bill, that instead of unlimited banking we should have the present restrictions upon those parts of the country that are supposed to have a sufficiency of banking capital, and to take off the limitations as to the South and the West. I would ask the gentleman what objection there can possibly be to allowing the Eastern and Middle States to have increased banking capital if they want it, and if their capitalists can use their capital advantageously in that form? How can that interfere with the prosperity of his part of the country or that which I represent, of the West or of the South?

Mr. HAVENS. Well, Mr. Speaker, as I endeavored to show, the money of the country will flow where the banks are—where the great banking transactions are carried on; and if you concentrate in any particular locality of the country an undue proportion of banks, an undue proportion of the currency will tend to that center. If you give to the Eastern States more than their proportion of the banks, you will concentrate banking transactions in New York City or in New England, and the money will inevitably flow there.

These large banking facilities also have the effect to encourage speculation. Speculative enterprises attract money to the centers where they are carried on. The evil which to-day is affecting the West more than anything else is the fact that an undue proportion of banking facilities of the country is concentrated in one particular locality, to which all the money of the country constantly tends. Hence we have heard since the late panic that money was plentiful in New York City and in the East, while it is scarce in the West. Why is it plentiful in New York City? Because the banks are there, because the banking facilities are there to attract it and to hold it when it gets there.

Just so long as any particular section of the country is permitted to maintain a preponderance of banking facilities, just so long the money of the country will tend to that particular locality. Free banking, as I believe, would present the opportunity for the Eastern States to establish more banks than the West, because they have more capital in shape to invest in that way; and in my judgment, under free banking, there would be a greater increase of banking facilities in the East than in the West. The present preponderance of banking facilities which draws money away from the West would remain; and we should continue to complain that our money flows away to the East.

Wherever there may be an undue concentration of banking capital speculative and artificial demands for money will exist, that will attract it and gather it up to the injury of legitimate business in remote localities.

[Mr. HOLMAN addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. MAYNARD. If no other gentleman desires to take the floor, I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 3, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, as the good faith of the motion I made yesterday to adjourn over Good Friday was questioned by some Senators very broadly, I have taken the pains to look at the precedents. Last year, 1873, we were not in session on Good Friday. March 28, 1872, we adjourned over Good Friday until Monday, on motion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who is now absent on account of his health. March 29, 1866, we adjourned over Good Friday until Monday. In 1868 the impeachment trial was pending, and on that account there was no adjournment over on Good Friday. I think until the war we always adjourned over on Good Friday, although I am not certain. Now, Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday.

Mr. MORTON. Is that motion in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator moves that the Senate adjourn until Monday.

Mr. HAMLIN. No; that when the Senate adjourns.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. That motion is debatable, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair on consultation is advised that the motion is not in order in the morning hour, if objected to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I move that we proceed to the consideration of the motion that was pending when we adjourned last evening.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator must move to suspend the morning hour business in order to get the floor for this purpose.

Mr. ANTHONY. That can only be done by unanimous consent, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can move to suspend the pending order, the morning hour business, in order to submit his motion; or he can submit it by unanimous consent.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I move to suspend the business of the morning hour with a view to enable me to submit a motion to adjourn over.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will observe that the unfinished business at one o'clock will be the very motion that he now desires to call up. Why not suspend it, then, during the morning hour? We shall not be very much damaged if we spend an hour in the transaction of the ordinary morning business.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no conscientious scruples about sitting on Good Friday. There are members of this body who have conscientious scruples; there are members of this body to whom it is painful to be here on this day; and I believe in religious freedom; and on their account, as well as in accordance with the general custom, I have made this motion. I should prefer to have the motion acted upon now, but if it is to be debated until one o'clock, we might as well go on with the morning business. Therefore, I will wait until the motion comes up in its order. If the question can be taken without debate, I should prefer it; but if it is to be debated, we might as well debate more profitable business and wait until it comes up in its regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator withdraws the motion. Petitions and memorials are in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, in relation to the construction of a military telegraph from Santa Fé to the various military posts in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LEWIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 660) for the relief of Richard S. Allen, of Richmond, Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ASBURY DICKINS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first bill on the Calendar is the bill (H. R. No. 1580) for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, the Senate has listened to the report of the committee. The minority presented their views to the Senate, which have never been read. If those views had been read and listened to attentively, it would not have been necessary for me, belonging to that minority, to say a word in advocacy of the bill. The minority do not differ from the majority in the facts in this case, which are few and simple; they only differ in the construction to be given to the act of Congress of 1792 and the act of 1818, which I will refer to before I sit down.

The facts in the case briefly are as follows, and, as I said before, about these there is no disagreement whatever in the committee: Mr. Dickins, while acting as chief clerk of the Treasury Department, served in the capacity of Secretary ad interim of the Department for a period of one hundred and thirty-three days at different times, under the appointment of the President of the United States, that appointment being conferred in conformity with the act of 1792. For his services as chief clerk he has been paid, but for his services as Secretary ad interim of the Treasury Department he never has received any compensation whatever. These services covered a period of four years under some eight different appointments, the first commencing on the 24th of April, 1829, and the last appointment being made on the 29th of May, 1833, the different periods of service aggregating, as I have said, one hundred and thirty-three days. He was subsequent to that time appointed chief clerk of the State Department, and at different periods he received appointments from General Jackson, at that time President of the United States, as Secretary of State ad interim, and he served the Government in that capacity at different times, under appointments made from August 10, 1833, to September 27, 1836, the period of two hundred and twenty-six days, and for that service he never received any compensation whatever.

I erred in my statement in relation to his services as Secretary of the Treasury. He did receive pay in that capacity for a period of a little upward of two months. With that exception, however, he never has received any compensation while serving as Secretary of State and Secretary of the Treasury during this period, amounting in all to three hundred and fifty-nine days.

The object of this bill is to pay him for that period of time, deducting what he has received while serving in this capacity as chief clerk in those Departments. It pays him simply the difference between his compensation as clerk and Secretary. Let me illustrate. Suppose that the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury at the time that Mr. Dickins was serving as Secretary ad interim was $6,000—I believe that was the compensation at that time. Suppose further that at that time the compensation of the chief clerk was $2,000 a year. Here would be a difference of $4,000 a year in the compensation; and if Mr. Dickins served a year in the capacity of Secretary of the Treasury, we claim that he should be entitled to this difference of $4,000.

Now, Mr. President, can there be any doubt about the abstract justice of this claim? At that time there was no law forbidding Mr. Dickins from receiving this double compensation. On the contrary, the precedents are numerous that up to the enactment of the law of 1839 men serving the Government in subordinate capacities, but transferred to a higher sphere in the same Department, received the compensation of their chiefs. I have a list here of precedents covering several pages which are all of that character. His claim was recognized at one time, and actually paid for the period of two months and more. It was passed upon at another time and recognized as legal, I believe, but was not paid, because there was no appropriation out of which he could be paid. But, as I have said, the precedents are numerous that he was entitled, while serving in two different capacities, to receive the compensation appertaining to the two offices in which he served. This bill, however, does not propose to pay him the salaries of the two offices, but simply the difference between what he has received and the compensation of the head of the Department whose place he filled for the time being.

Sir, we should have no hesitation whatever in the affairs of ordinary life in applying the principle which we claim is applicable here. If a man serving in the capacity of a clerk or teller in a bank is, on account of the death or the sickness of the cashier, promoted to his place and discharges intelligently all the duties of the cashier for the period of three or six months, no one would hesitate for a moment to say that he should be entitled to the compensation of the cashier during that time.

If an engineer conducting a railroad train were taken sick and a brakeman possessed the competent intelligence and skill to fill his place and run the train for a month or three months, no one would hesitate a moment in saying he was entitled to the compensation of the engineer.

Let me put another case. The chairman of this committee is a lawyer of extensive business and profitable practice. He employs a clerk at a salary of $1,500 a year to do the scrivener work of his office—to draw his contracts, his mortgages, his deeds, to prepare his pleadings, hunt up the authorites, and to brief his cases. Suppose that the Senator is stricken down by sickness and is unable to attend court and do justice to his clients, and his clerk takes his place for the time being and tries his cases in court; would he hesitate for a moment in saying that that clerk ought to receive a higher compensation than as a mere clerk?

But I need not multiply illustrations. It is very clear to me that if the Secretary of the Treasury was entitled to $6,000 a year compensation, and Asbury Dickins filled his place for a period of one hundred and thirty-three days with equal intelligence and ability, he ought in justice to receive the same compensation as his chief.

Before I sit down, if I have time, I will cite the Senate to several instances where claims of this character in principle have been allowed and paid under the opinion of the Attorney-General.

On the 11th of August, 1859, the First Auditor of the Treasury examined and adjusted the account of Mr. Dickins, but it was not paid then simply because there was no appropriation applicable. On the 10th of March, 1854, the Senate passed this bill, or one substantially like it. On the 3d of March, 1855, while it was pending in the House, Congress being near its close, it was referred under a general resolution to the Court of Claims for consideration. On the 2d of April, 1856, that court made their report to Congress, accompanied by a bill. The opinion in that case was pronounced by Judge Blackford, one of the earliest judges appointed to that court, a citizen of the State of Indiana, and one of its most eminent jurists. The opinion is not reported at length in the volume which I hold in my hand, which is Devereux's Court of Claims Reports, but there is an abstract of the decision, which I will read from page 42. Speaking of the claim of Asbury Dickins against the United States it is said:

> The claimant, while chief clerk in the Treasury Department, at different periods between April 24, 1829, and May 31, 1833, acted as Secretary of the Treasury, performing the duties of the office, by authority of the President of the United States, on account of the absence from the seat of Government or sickness of the Secretary of the Treasury. Held: The claimant, at the times he so performed the duties of Secretary of the Treasury, held an office separate from his office of chief clerk; that is, held two offices, there being at the time no law to prohibit him from doing so; and as he discharged the duties of both offices, is entitled to compensation accordingly. (Per Blackford, J., Dickins vs. The United States.)

This decision was made in 1856, many years after the act of 1839 was passed, upon which the chairman of the committee commented the other day. These services, however, were all performed anterior to the act of 1839. That act then did not stand in the way; it does not stand in the way now of the passage of the bill. It was not retroactive in its operations, but simply prospective. Here, then, we have a decision of the Court of Claims that has never been overruled; it stands as the law to-day; and it defines with precision what were the rights of Asbury Dickins then before the court.

The same opinion, however, was given by several of the Attorneys-General of the United States. Let me refer in this connection to two or three. I read now from the second volume of Opinions of Attorneys-General. I will first refer to the claim of General Harrison for services on the Wabash. It is known that General Harrison was at that time Governor of the Indiana Territory, and he preferred a claim against the Government for the services which he performed as general of the army of the United States in conducting the campaign on the Wabash which culminated in the battle of Tippecanoe. The Attorney-General on the 17th day of January, 1826, rendered his opinion, from which I read the following extract:

> Without the act of the 10th of April, 1812, I should hold that a special appointment by the President to the governor of a Territory to take the command of a mixed army of regulars and militia from other States to carry on war with the Indians, more especially offensive war, as giving the person so appointed a claim on the Government for the pay and emoluments suited to the command to which he had been called. For it is impossible to maintain the position that our laws, in fixing the salaries of the governors of Territories, could have had in view such services as those; or that, because a man has accepted the appointment of governor of a Territory, he may therefore be called to any service of life and death, at the pleasure of the Government, without any manner of compensation for services.

Here, then, the claim is fully sustained. He says in conclusion:

> I am of the opinion that the law, in fair construction, covers his case; that he is within the spirit of it, seems to me beyond the reach of controversy.

Mr. Wirt was at that time the Attorney-General. I have another opinion of Mr. Wirt, given on the 12th of December, 1828, upon a claimed preferred by General Cass while he was governor of the Territory of Michigan. The syllabus is as follows:

> Governor Cass having been employed by the Government to perform services which did not belong to his duty as governor of the Michigan Territory, he has a fair claim to compensation on the principles of a quantum meruit.

The opinion proceeds to say:

> I understand the facts stated in Governor Cass's letter of the 26th November to be admitted; and if so, I can perceive no ground on which his claim can be properly resisted. His salary as governor is a compensation for his services as governor, but the services for which he claims do not belong to his duty as governor of the Michigan Territory; and having been employed by the Government to perform these services, he has a fair claim for them on the principles of a quantum meruit. The facts conceded, I think his right undeniable.

Though this opinion does not proceed to state what was the character of the services rendered by General Cass for which the Attorney-General thought he was entitled to compensation, I can state what they were to the Senate. He was appointed repeatedly by the President as a commissioner for the purpose of negotiating treaties with the Indians. He negotiated treaties with a great many different tribes while he was governor. One of the most important treaties, perhaps, that was ever made in the State of Indiana was negotiated by him in connection with two other commissioners in the year 1826; and I presume, though the opinion does not state the fact, that this was the nature of the services for which he claimed compensation of the Government. And here the principle is broadly asserted, as in the case I have cited from the Court of Claims, that although holding an office for which he was paid a specific salary, there was nothing in the law which prevented him from receiving compensation for discharging other official duties outside those of governor during the time that he held his commission as governor.

In this connection, I wish to refer to the act of 1792 under which Mr. Dickins received these appointments and performed these services. It reads as follows:

> That in case of the death, absence from the seat of Government, or sickness of the Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, or of the Secretary of the War Department, or of any officer of either of the said Departments whose appointment is not in the head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their respective offices, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices until a successor be appointed, or until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease.

Could more plenary powers have been conferred upon the President? You will notice, sir, that the appointment authorized is not confined to employés of the Department over which the person appointed is to preside, but the President may go outside of the Department and may appoint any person to fill the office ad interim. A case was cited by my friend from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] the other day where a person outside of the State Department had been appointed Acting Secretary of State, and had received his compensation without any question being made whatever; and I understand the opposition here is based solely upon the fact that at the time of receiving this appointment of Secretary ad interim Mr. Dickins was serving as a clerk in that same Department and receiving a salary. Now, sir, is there anything in this act which prevented his appointment, or his appointment being made, which prohibits him from receiving the compensation of the head of that Department? Not a word of it. On the contrary, as I have already shown, his claim was recognized and paid for some two months. The same claim, I repeat, that we are urging here was recognized, recognized by the Auditor of the Treasury who examined Mr. Dickins's account and adjusted it, for two months, and it was paid. If it was right to pay him the salary of the chief of that Department for two months, why not for the entire one hundred and thirty-three days?

We have had frequent reference to the act of 1839, which was intended to put a stop to claims of this character. and which has put a stop to them. I do not claim for a moment that had these services been rendered since the act of 1839, Mr. Dickins or his legatees would have any standing before Congress. But, sir, this act of 1839 is a clear recognition that the rule had been different before. Let me read it; I believe it has not been read at any time during the course of this debate. It was passed on the 3d of March, 1839, and the third section is as follows:

That no officer in any branch of the public service, or any other person whose salaries, or whose pay or emoluments, is or are fixed by law and regulations, shall receive any extra allowance or compensation in any form whatever for the disbursement of public money, or the performance of any other service, unless the said extra allowance or compensation be authorized by law.

If Mr. Dickins had been serving in the Treasury Department subsequent to the passage of this law as chief clerk, of course he could not have instituted any such claim as this, nor could his heirs since his death be heard. It would have been replied, "You took the office of chief clerk cum onere; you assented to the conditions of this law; you agreed in accepting this office that if you were transferred to the head of that Department you would make no extra charge for that service;" and the argument would have been unanswerable. It is because this claim originated before this law, and when it had been solemnly adjudicated that a man might hold two offices at the same time and receive the compensation of those offices, that this claim rests.

Why, sir, this is not a new thing, this right to hold two offices at the same time. It exists now in the States. In my own State there is a provision in the constitution that a man may hold an office under the State and at the same time be deputy postmaster, and receive the emoluments of both offices. There is another constitutional provision that in new counties, where the number of polls does not exceed one thousand, the same man may hold the offices of auditor, clerk, and recorder, or any two of these offices, and receive their compensation. Why, sir, the question was never doubted that I know of seriously; otherwise this act of 1839 would not have been passed. It was passed to cure this very mischief, to prevent persons serving the Government of the United States from receiving double compensation for serving the Government in different capacities. That was the whole purpose of the law; and if the practice had not been different up to that time why should this law ever have been enacted?

My friend, the chairman of the committee, supposes that this claim was barred by the act of 1818; but there is nothing in that act fairly construed which bars it. That act was before the Court of Claims at the time that Asbury Dickins was before that court as a claimant, and his right was clearly recognized. That decision was made in 1856, long after this act of 1818 was in force. Is it to be presumed for a moment that the Court of Claims were ignorant of that law? Yet I have read to you the opinion of the court:

Held: The claimant, at the times he so performed the duties of Secretary of the Treasury—

And that was after the act of 1818 was in force—held an office separate from his office of chief clerk, that is, held two offices, there being at the time no law to prohibit him from doing so, and as he discharged the duties of both offices, is entitled to compensation accordingly.

Now, sir, do you suppose that court was blind? With the Statutes at Large before them, do you suppose for a moment that this act of 1818 escaped their attention? The court obviously thought it was not applicable to the case; nor was there anything in the language of that act that would seem to make it so. Let me read that act of 1818 which has been so often thrown in our faces. The ninth section of that act is as follows:

SEC. 9. That the compensation allowed by this act to clerks shall commence from and after the 31st day of March last, and it shall be the duty of the Secretaries for the Departments of State, Treasury, War, and Navy, of the Commissioners of the Navy, and the Postmaster-General, to report to Congress at the beginning of each year the names of the clerks they have employed respectively in the preceding year, together with the time each clerk was actively employed during the year, and the sums paid to each; and no higher or other allowance shall be made to any clerk in the said Departments and offices than is authorized by this act.

What is the meaning of that? It is that no additional compensation shall be made to them as clerks; no extra compensation for extra labor done during the period they were officiating as clerks shall be made to them. That must be the meaning of it; otherwise certainly the Court of Claims would never for a moment have sanctioned the claim of Mr. Dickins, who was a chief clerk in the Department after the act of 1818 was in force.

I resume, Mr. President, the history of this claim of Mr. Dickins in Congress. I brought it down to March 3, 1855, when it was referred to the Court of Claims and passed upon there favorably. At that time the Court of Claims had no power to render judgments. Had it possessed the power then which it possesses now, Mr. Dickins would have been paid for these services as Secretary of State ad interim and Secretary of the Treasury ad interim, and we should never have heard of this claim. But at that time all that the Court of Claims could do was to find the facts, give their opinion of the law, and make a report to Congress accompanied by a bill; and that was done in this case. The House committee reported a bill, substantially the bill now before the Senate, for the payment to Mr. Dickins of his claim.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator permit me to correct him just at that point? It may perhaps be in the line of strengthening his argument, but it is a fact, and I wish it to appear, for I think it militates against the opinion of the Court of Claims. It is this: the amount they found was not the difference between his salary as chief clerk of those Departments and the salary of the heads of those Departments, but it was the amount of the salary of the heads of the Departments for the time he served without deducting his pay as chief clerk, thus giving him the full salary of both offices for that time. That was the decision of the court.

Mr. PRATT. I accept the correction of the honorable Senator. It follows, of course, as a logical conclusion from the opinion of the court which I have already had occasion to read, that decision being that Mr. Dickins held two offices and that there was at that time no law to prohibit him from holding them, and of course he was entitled to the double compensation. Now, sir, this bill does not claim that. It claims simply the difference between his pay as chief clerk, let it be what it may have been, and the pay of the head of the Department for the time being. That is the whole of it. The committee, while having this matter in charge, thought that this was doing justice to the estate of Mr. Dickins, and did not prefer the claim which would seem to be warranted by the decision of the Court of Claims.

But, Mr. President, I am admonished that the morning hour has nearly expired, and although there are several other points I had designed to touch upon, I will omit saying anything further now for the purpose of reaching a vote.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not desire to postpone a vote, but I must call the attention of the Senate to one feature of this case before they vote upon it. In answer to the argument made about the decision of the Court of Claims, I wish simply to say that the fundamental error into which that court fell was in holding that Mr. Dickins did hold two offices. I made an argument to show that he could not hold two offices. He was performing the duties of the one while he was holding the other.

But, sir, under the act of 1792, which I have already referred to, a question arose during the impeachment trial in 1868, and it became necessary, for the purpose of making out the case of the then President, to bring into the Senate and offer in evidence a list of the appointments and details that had been made under this act of 1792. I refer to it, in the supplement to the Congressional Globe containing that trial, beginning on page 188, covering pages 189, 190, 191, and on that is a message from Mr. Buchanan, dated January 15, 1861, in which he undertakes to show the authority by which he had made details of this character under the act of 1792, and accompanies it with a list of them, and it runs on to page 192 and covers pages 193 and 194, and then a number of cases coming down to 1860 are added, covering several pages more of appointments made under this act of 1792. In the course of the trial, when opinions came to be delivered, I find that the act of 1792 was referred to as supplied by the act of 1795, and the constitutionality of both acts questioned upon the very ground which I made in the remarks that I submitted yesterday. But, sir, here is a list—I have not had time to count them—of cases beginning in 1819, only ten years before this case originated, a list of some five or six hundred cases, all of which, if they have not already been paid—some of them, I suppose, have been—will come in and make their claims if we pay this one. In addition to that, how many second-class clerks are to-day performing the duties of third-class clerks? How many third-class clerks are performing the duties of fourth-class clerks, and so on all through the Departments? It is not because I am here against the claim of Mr. Dickins, as I have already said, or of his legatees, that I make this opposition; but it is as the organ of the Committee on Claims. If it were Mr. Dickins alone, if it were his estimable and courteous daughters alone, I should be glad to say, let them have the money. But, Mr. President, if you vote this claim you open the door to all this class of claims, and that is what I wish to call the attention of the Senate to before the vote is taken.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will inquire of the honorable chairman if the cases which he has just now referred to are cases where the appointments were made in pursuance of the act of 1792? That act only provided for appointments to Cabinet positions in the Departments of Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, and Secretary of War, and it cannot be possible that all those cases belong to that class.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator is mistaken in reference to the provisions of the act. It reads:

That in case of the death, absence from the seat of Government, or sickness of the Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, or of the Secretary of the War Department, or of any officer of either of the said Departments whose appointment is not in the head thereof, &c.

It provides for more than the appointment of heads of Departments.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is true; it does include the subordinate officers, the appointment of whom is not in the heads of Departments; but as a matter of fact, nearly all the subordinate officers were appointed by the heads of Departments; so that it left but a very few to be appointed by the President in pursuance of that act.

Mr. SCOTT. Let us have the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, if this body were an eleemosynary institution, I should think this a most excellent charity, and that we ought to give it our consideration; but as it happens that the people of this country have about as much as they can do at the present time to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government, postponing their debts and liabilities, and as the last four months here show the struggle that is going on to keep our head above water, to keep the Treasury of the United States from absolute bankruptcy, it seems to me that if there is any rule by which economy ought to be observed, it ought to be applied at the present time. Now——

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next; which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] moved to amend by inserting "Saturday" instead of "Monday next." Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. ROBERTSON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment, and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORTON. I presume that the Senator from Michigan himself would not insist upon the Senate meeting to-morrow unless the Senate should be inclined to adjourn over to-day. If we are to lose to-day, then I think we ought to meet to-morrow to make it up; but if the Senate is not to adjourn over to-day, but is to go on with business, I presume the Senator from Michigan would not care about the Senate meeting to-morrow. I do not know how that is.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am not disposed to throw any obstacles in the way of adjourning over to-day if that is the wish of several of the Senators, but I feel at the same time that it would be wrong to the country under the circumstances, and pending the financial bill, which has occupied so much time, for us now to adjourn over until Monday. Feeling, from the remarks that have been made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that the country were demanding action upon this question, perhaps smarting a little under that criticism, because I have taken a little of the time of the Senate upon the question, I now appeal to the Senator himself, and to other Senators, that if we are to adjourn over to-day we should meet on Saturday.

I heard from the Senator from Rhode Island the precedents which he cited, which are new to me. No such case has occurred since I have been in the Senate. I am willing, however, to defer to those precedents; but I hope he will join me in agreeing that to-morrow we shall meet here and make up for the time lost to-day, so that the week shall not be lost by our adjournment over to-day. Let Senators be allowed to observe Good Friday, and I wish them hearty good-will in it, but let us meet on Saturday, and go through with the financial bill.

But, on the other hand, in reply to what has been said by the Senator from Indiana, if it is thought best to go on to-day with this bill, certainly I am not disposed to meet on Saturday; and if that is the intention of the Senate I would withdraw my amendment, if the Senate were disposed to allow me to do so, as I cannot do it without consent, inasmuch as the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yesterday I put to the Senator from Michigan our new principle of parliamentary law, questioning the right of a man to move an amendment to a proposition unless he intended to vote for it. I asked him if he intended to vote for this proposition if his amendment should prevail, and I understood him to say distinctly that he did not. Now I think if we do not sit on Friday and Saturday, the very interesting speeches which we have heard upon this subject of finance have been so impressed upon our minds by frequent and continuous repetition that we shall be able to remember them from now until Monday, when they can be repeated over again just as well as on Saturday; and I hope that we shall adjourn over, as we have been accustomed to do on this day, until Monday.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I stated yesterday in reply to the same point made by the Senator from Rhode Island that this is a religious question which seems to be pending now and the other was a financial one, and therefore I should act differently upon this from what I would upon the other. I do not wish it to be understood that I am opposed to members observing the day; and again I suggest to the Senator that the better way to do that is to let those Senators who feel it their duty conscientiously to observe this day pair with other Senators. I am ready to pair with any Senator who feels that he must observe this day away from this Chamber. That can easily be done, and leave a quorum in the Senate to proceed with the business of the Senate.

Now, in answer to what has been said by the Senator from Rhode Island, I did yesterday say that while I would vote for the amendment I proposed, I should vote against the adjournment over. I did not at that time know that there were any precedents for adjourning over Good Friday; but to-day the honorable Senator has cited several precedents. Now I say again I am willing to defer to them; but I say to him, let my amendment be carried that we meet to-morrow and spend Saturday here and conclude the bill that is now pending before the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator from Michigan what would be his advantage if all the gentlemen who desire to absent themselves to-day should agree to pair with those who do not, on this subject? The result would be that the Senate would have no quorum, and the first vote taken would disclose that fact, and thereupon the transaction of public business would cease.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If the Senate will vote for an amendment to adjourn to-day and meet to-morrow——

Mr. BAYARD. That would not in any degree affect the question made by the Senator. He proposed as a remedy for the consciences of Senators that they pair with others; and my answer is, if it should go to the extent of all those who have some conscience or opinion on that subject, he would find the Senate without a quorum.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I merely reply to that, without occupying time, that I defer to the Senator's judgment of the complexion of the Senate in that regard. If he states there will be so many who would pair as to leave the Senate without a quorum, then I say meet us in adjourning until to-morrow, and sitting here on Saturday; let us not waste for the business of the Senate and the country two days of this week. Let us give up Friday and meet here on Saturday, and we shall have accomplished as much for this week as any other, for we have not sat on any Saturday this session.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am very glad that my friend from Michigan has gone back from his new theories to the old precedents, which I think are always safest; and so far as I am familiar with them the adjournment has uniformly been to Monday. We adjourned to Monday in 1872; we adjourned to Monday in 1866. In 1868 the impeachment trial was pending, and for that reason we did not adjourn at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The yeas and nays have been ordered, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the roll-call will proceed on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to substitute "Saturday" for "Monday."

Mr. BOREMAN. I have voted against adjourning over, but I am willing to defer to the wishes and feelings of gentlemen who have conscientious scruples about sitting here to-day. I do not see, however, that there will be anything gained by coming back here to-morrow. If we come back and sit here to-morrow, we shall do very little; and I think the better way is to adjourn until Monday. Therefore on this vote I shall feel it my duty to oppose those of my friends who wish to substitute "Saturday" for "Monday."

Mr. HAMLIN. I presume other Senators are situated as I find myself—troubled with matters which we cannot well avoid outside of this Hall, and perhaps somewhat outside of our legitimate congressional duties. I refer to calls that are made upon us by our constituents in regard to business matters at the various Departments. Had the Senate yesterday considered this matter, I would not have objected to adjourning over until Saturday; but the day is gone for any such purpose; I cannot devote this day to that purpose, having no particular conscientious scruples against doing my duty either here or elsewhere. I want to-morrow therefore to do these duties that are pressed upon me and that I cannot avoid. Otherwise I would vote to meet to-morrow.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. To meet just that case and others, as we are now here in session and it may be can retain enough to go on with business to-day and still give Saturday for the business to which the Senator from Maine has alluded, I will, if the Senate will allow me, withdraw my amendment and agree to take the question on adjourning over to Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered upon it, to withdraw his motion to amend the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. MORTON. I beg leave to say in that connection that I hope when the motion is withdrawn the Senate will then resolve not to adjourn to-day until we finish this financial question, or at least not to adjourn until the usual hour comes. Let us stay here and devote to-day to this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the motion of the Senator from Michigan? The Chair hears none, and it is withdrawn.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Ohio. He has several times indicated to us his purpose to press a vote upon this bill; has announced on more than one occasion that he should ask the next day that the Senate should remain in session until the bill was disposed of. In that request I have always been inclined to concur and stand by him. I still have that disposition, and I should like very much to know what he wishes on this subject, whether his wish is that we shall remain here to-day and to-morrow and press this bill to a vote, or whether, in view of the condition of the country which he has so frequently pointed out and has presented to the Senate so very urgently and eloquently, he is at this time willing for the Senate to adjourn. I ask whether he advises the members of the committee who act with him, not upon all the matters in connection with this bill, but in the earnest wish to press the bill to a vote, to agree that the Senate shall now adjourn until Monday; or whether, in view of the condition of the country as he understands it, he deems it better that we sit here to-day and to-morrow?

So far as I am concerned, I say unhesitatingly that I believe we ought to stay here to-day, and to-morrow also if it is necessary, to dispose of this bill. I think if a month since the country needed that we should remain here and stand by this bill as something for the country, certainly that demand is much greater and stronger now. Every one knows, I need not repeat it—every Senator on this floor has had letter upon letter urging it and pressing upon us the necessity of acting on this bill. I believe this bill is in such a condition that we can dispose of it to-day if we remain; and if the chairman of the committee will reiterate what he has said heretofore and appeal to the Senate to stand by this bill, I believe we shall remain here to-day and dispose of it. I think it will be infinitely better for the country and for us that we do so than to now adjourn over till to-morrow or until Monday.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think my friend from Iowa is laboring under a great mistake. I have not heard the chairman of the Committee on Finance say that it was important to pass this bill to-day or at any time. It was a different bill from this that he thought the interests of the country required. On the contrary, I think I have heard him intimate that he never would vote for this bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. Why, Mr. President, I have not said that the Senator from Ohio insisted that this bill should pass, but he has insisted more than once that we should remain and dispose of the bill, dispose of the question, pass the bill or have it defeated. He has so insisted before this Senate; and I now ask him, as chairman of the Finance Committee, to say to the Senate what his preference is on this question. We are either under his lead to lose two days upon this bill or we are to remain here and attempt to dispose of the bill, either to pass it or defeat it. I should be very glad to know what his preference is.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator intend to follow the advice that he asks?

Mr. WRIGHT. I have already said that my preference is that we should remain here and dispose of this bill. I have been inclined, as I have already said, to follow the lead of the Senator from Ohio on that subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have voted steadily against all adjournments, and to bring the bill to a conclusion, although for the last three or four days it has been in such a condition that I certainly mean to vote against it, and regard its passage, in its present form, as an unmixed calamity. I do not consider myself responsible for the action of the majority, but it seems to me—and I say it in good temper and in good humor—that the gentlemen who compose the majority, and who have put this bill in such a position that I cannot vote for it, and that others who reported the bill and brought it before the Senate cannot vote it, ought to speak to the supporters of the bill to stay here and not vote for the first motion to adjourn. I have voted steadily against every adjournment up to this time. Now as to whether it is better to adjourn to-day or not, I really do not know how to advise the Senate. I think, on the whole, that if we had one or two days for calm reflection it is possible that this bill might be put into a shape that would command much greater strength in the country, and certainly where it might command my vote. It cannot as it now stands. I think the majority of the Senate who seem to stand in favor of this bill ought to determine whether or not they will give us a little time and themselves a little time for reflection. I shall vote against the adjournment because I wish to bring the thing to a conclusion, but I am not so sure that it would not be better for the country that we should adjourn over until Monday, in order to perfect and mature the bill. As it now stands I shall vote against the bill, and I shall vote against the adjournment.

As for Good Friday, I was reared in the faith of the Episcopal Church, and they have always regarded it as a holy-day, especially so; but at the same time I think the best way to observe a holy-day is to pursue the ordinary discharge of one's business, provided it is an honest business, and especially if it promotes the public service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The question being put, the Chair declared that the "ayes" appeared to prevail.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORTON. I would suggest to the Senator from Michigan that on the motion to adjourn, which I presume will follow immediately, we take the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion now is that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MORTON. The adoption of that will not adjourn the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course not.

Mr. MORTON. Then on the motion to adjourn, which I presume will follow, we can have the yeas and nays.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Very well. I did not understand the question before. The proposition is simply that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next. I am not disposed to oppose that, but I shall vote against an adjournment now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call for the yeas and nays being withdrawn, no division being called for, the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island is agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 28, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Stockton, and Thurman—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Carpenter, Clayton, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Sherman, Spencer, Tipton, Wadleigh, West, and Wright—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Conover, Dennis, Edmunds, Gilbert, Jones, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, and Windom—14.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

THE CURRENCY—SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order is before the Senate, being the resolution reported by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] from the Committee on Finance, declaring it to be the duty of Congress at the present session to adopt definite measures to redeem the pledge made in the act of March 18, 1869, for the earliest practicable redemption of the United States notes in coin.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us take that up by all means.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is up.

Mr. HAMLIN. I should like permission to present a petition before we proceed to the regular business of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it if there be no objection.

ADDITIONAL PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I present a memorial signed by Dallas Knowlton and various other residents of this city, who allege that the general sewerage act of the District of Columbia imposes a specific tax of two cents per square foot, whether the land be worth two cents or twenty dollars per foot, and that it is a grievous and unconstitutional tax, and they ask relief therefrom. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. May I present a memorial?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive morning business at present if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the memorial of citizens and freeholders of Oneida County, New York, that region being the greatest hop-producing region in the country, setting forth the injustice, as they conceive, in the existing tariff concerning hops, and praying that a duty of fifteen cents a pound may be imposed on all hops imported into the United States from foreign countries. The legislation prayed for, I know, cannot originate in the Senate, being a change in the tariff; nevertheless as this memorial is sent to me, I beg to present it and move its reference to the Committee on Finance, with the remark that the case stated is a very strong one, and I am satisfied that it deserves consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions of a public meeting of colored citizens of San Francisco, California, in respect to the memory of the late Hon. Charles Sumner; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GORDON presented a petition of a large number of planters and other citizens of Georgia, praying that legal-tender notes may be substituted for national-bank notes, declared equal with coin, and convertible into bonds, bearing interest at 3.65 per cent. per annum; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

BANKING AND CURRENCY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order indicated by the Chair is now before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take from the table the bill S. No. 617, which is really the unfinished business; and when it is taken up I intend to appeal to the Senate to let the matter go over until Monday. I move that it be taken from the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 617) to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes, and for free banking.

Mr. SHERMAN. My purpose is, on Monday or whenever the matter comes up—now, if the Senate determine to go on with it—to move the second and fourth sections, with some modifications, as amendments. I think on the whole it would be better to adjourn over until Monday. There is a bill lying on the table which may take a little time, but not long. I think if we can get a little rest we may make more progress by coming back fresh on Monday than wasting this day in debating the question that we have already debated so much.

Mr. MERRIMON. I desire to make the first section of the substitute which I offered for the bill conform in terms to the section adopted by the Senate in lieu of the first section of the bill as reported by the committee. There is a slight verbal difference.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I submit to the Senate that without debate this bill be postponed until Monday. I desire to offer one or two amendments; but I have consulted with Senators of opposite views on this subject, and I will submit the motion that this bill be deferred until Monday and continued as the unfinished business, with a view to give us an opportunity to think over the matter a little more fully and with the hope that we shall then close it.

Mr. THURMAN. The bill ought to be printed with the pending amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are no amendments except to strike out the second and fourth sections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those are the only amendments adopted except that of the Senator from North Carolina to strike out the third section and insert another in its stead. There is a pending propostion to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute—an amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MORTON. The question now is on the substitute.

Mr. SHERMAN. The third section has been stricken out and the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina adopted in lieu of it.

Mr. MORTON. The substitute embraces precisely what has been adopted on the bill, embracing the first and third sections as adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the condition of the bill as it appears by the record.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first section was stricken out on the motion of Mr. WRIGHT, and the following was inserted in lieu of the section stricken out:

That the maximum amount of United States notes is hereby fixed at $400,000,000.

The second section was stricken out. The third section was stricken out, and in lieu thereof the following inserted:

That $46,000,000 in United States notes for circulation, in addition to such circulation now allowed by law, shall be issued to national-banking associations now organized and which may be organized hereafter; and such increased circulation shall be distributed among the several States as provided in section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

The fourth section was stricken out, and the fifth and sixth sections yet remain in the bill. The amendment now pending is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the substitute proposed by Mr. MERRIMON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suggest what change he wishes.

Mr. MERRIMON. I desire to substitute the words adopted by the Senate in lieu of the first section of the bill, for the first section of the substitute offered by me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Senator can accomplish his purpose by asking unanimous consent to withdraw the first section of his substitute, the other having been adopted by the Senate.

Mr. MERRIMON. I make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to withdraw the first section of his substitute. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MERRIMON. Now I wish to supply it with the section which was adopted in lieu of the first section of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has already been adopted, and when the Senator's substitute is added to it it will be all right.

Mr. MERRIMON. I make it part of the substitute, so that the substitute will be in lieu of the bill as perfected by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Very well.

Mr. THURMAN. Is that in order, to move to strike out that which has already been inserted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not except by unanimous consent. The Chair called for objections and heard none.

Mr. MORTON. It was only a change which the Senator from North Carolina had a right to make without the consent of the Senate. He offers a substitute of two sections, and he desires to change the first section of the substitute before the vote is taken; that is all.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have a right to do that, I believe.

Mr. THURMAN. That is not the point at all. If I understand it, the Senator wants to move to strike out the first section of the bill as it now stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That cannot be done, of course.

Mr. THURMAN. But he can get at his object by moving to strike out all of the bill after the first section.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator does not comprehend the point.

Mr. MERRIMON. The substitute which I offered has not been acted upon; no vote has been taken upon it; no action whatever has been had upon it; and I have a right to substitute the words which the Senate have adopted in lieu of the first section of the bill as part and parcel of my substitute. That is what I propose to do.

Mr. CONKLING. Then why does the Senator want to withdraw anything?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina suggests what is a perfectly proper mode of proceeding on his part.

Mr. CONKLING. Then he does not want to withdraw anything now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the amendment as now modified be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection. The Chair will order the bill to be reprinted with the pending amendments if there be no objection.

Mr. MORTON. If that is to carry with it the idea of an adjournment now, I object.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to give notice of an amendment which I propose to offer to the pending finance bill, and I think perhaps that it had better be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be ordered to be printed if there be no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to make a statement which may have an influence on the pending bill, and which will occupy but a few moments.

On the day before yesterday, when the bill now under discussion was before the Senate, I stated that taking New York as the basis for the increased bank circulation as proposed in the third section, it would add to the volume of circulation $124,000,000; that taking Pennsylvania as the basis, it would add $110,000,000 in round numbers, and taking Maine, it would add $280,000,000. The statement was thought to be an error by many Senators, and in fact it was so generally supposed to be so by Senators that I began to have some doubt myself about it. Since that time I have seen the Comptroller of the Currency, and obtained from him a statement which I now hold in my hand. I find that I was correct in my assertion that the basis of New York would give $124,000,000 additional circulation. This statement contains a list of the States which would receive increased circulation under the New York basis, and I observe that even Pennsylvania would receive some additional circulation upon that basis. As it will have a bearing in the future, I present this table:

Statement showing the circulation of certain States and an apportionment to the same States upon the basis of the circulation of New York.

States.	Apportionment, basis of New York.	Outstanding and authorized.	Amount of increase.
Pennsylvania	$42,397,889	$42,055,781	$342,108
Virginia	10,447,297	3,902,342	6,544,955
West Virginia	3,970,711	2,360,307	1,610,404
North Carolina	8,677,946	1,819,300	6,858,646
Georgia	9,497,057	2,365,605	7,131,452
Ohio	29,046,070	23,876,370	5,169,700
Indiana	17,650,958	14,706,415	2,944,543
Illinois	27,639,399	17,824,209	9,815,190
Michigan	11,616,592	7,485,043	4,131,549
Iowa	11,678,533	5,674,385	6,004,148
Minnesota	4,134,469	3,330,414	804,055
Kansas	3,422,551	1,825,496	1,597,055
Nebraska	1,181,142	809,500	371,642
Total	181,360,614	128,035,167	53,325,167

Amount required to bring all the States up to New York, $124,062,267.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there anything pending before the Senate now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nothing but this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator if he will allow us to take up and dispose of, one way or the other, either by referring it to a standing committee or a committee of conference, the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill in relation to the Louisville and Portland Canal?

Mr. CONKLING. I will not insist on my motion if the Senator wishes to take up that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York withdraws his motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. Of course the understanding is that the pending financial bill will remain the unfinished business to be called up at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending bill will remain the unfinished business.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Ohio asks that the further consideration of this bill shall be postponed until Monday and that it shall then be the unfinished business. That is his proposition, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be the effect of it, if the Senate adjourns now.

Mr. MORTON. I do not want to be considered as resisting the chairman of the committee; but I wish it to be understood that we shall then proceed with the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill is now the business before the Senate, and if the Senate adjourns in that state of things it will be the unfinished business on Monday next at one o'clock. The Senator from Ohio now asks, without displacing it, that the Senate proceed to consider some other matter, the Chair does not know what. It requires unanimous consent.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. RAMSEY. Before proceeding to other business, I ask leave to offer the following resolution, for reference to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That one thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads on the bill (S. No. 651) to provide for the transmission of correspondence by telegraph be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1063) to restore Captain John C. Beaumont, of the United States Navy, to his original position on the Navy Register;

A bill (H. R. No. 2538) to legalize and establish a ponton railway bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien;

A bill (H. R. No. 2667) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to gather authentic information as to the condition and importance of the fur trade in the Territory of Alaska; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 81) requesting the President to intercede with Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain for the release of Edward O'Meagher Condon, now confined in prison in Manchester, England.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a bill lying on the table which has been returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment which I ask to have taken up and disposed of now.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move the reference of the bill with the House amendment to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, if that is the committee from which it came. It ought really to go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. My colleague, who is not now here, moved to disagree to the amendment and ask for a committee of conference. I do not know which motion takes precedence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Michigan has precedence.

Mr. SHERMAN. I appeal to the Senator from Michigan to withdraw his motion. I have examined this bill, and I have read the debate in the House. The only point in controversy is as to a period of time, whether possession shall be taken now of this canal or whether it shall be taken two years hence, when the Legislature of Kentucky can convene. I have not the slightest doubt that a committee of conference, of which the Senator from Michigan, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, might properly be a member, could adjust and arrange this matter without any controversy. The bill, in its present form, substantially has passed both Houses. The only question of difference is the one I have referred to.

Mr. MORTON. The point of difference, as I understand, is in relation to what is known as the Wheeler amendment. I should like to hear it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Secretary to read that amendment attached to the bill. It simply declares that the Secretary of War shall not take possession of this property until the Legislature of Kentucky has surrendered jurisdiction, &c.

Mr. CHANDLER. By permission, I will change my motion and move to refer the bill and amendment to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan to refer the bill, with the amendment of the House of Representatives, to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I should like to have the point referred to by the Senator from Indiana read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill as amended by the House reads:

That the appropriations made by the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," for the payment of the debts of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, are hereby continued in full force, and are made permanently applicable to the payment of the debts of the said Louisville and Portland Canal Company; and so much as may be necessary shall be applied to the payment of the interest as it accrues, and the principal of the outstanding bonds of said company as they mature: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury may purchase and pay for any of said bonds, at their market price, not above par, whenever he deems it for the interest of the United States: Provided further, That said Secretary shall pay no money under any of the provisions of this act, nor shall the Secretary of War take possession of said canal as authorized by the next section, until the State of Kentucky shall cede to the United States jurisdiction over the said canal, with all its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, and relinquish to the United States the right to tax, or in any way to assess, said canal, its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, or the property of the United States that may be thereon during the time that the United States shall remain the owner thereof.

Mr. SHERMAN. That second proviso is the Wheeler amendment.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

SEC. 2. That after thirty days from the passage of this act the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to take possession of the said Louisville and Portland Canal, and all the property, real and personal, of said company——

Mr. MORTON. The Secretary need not read the rest of the bill. It was only that proviso that I wanted to hear. The remainder of the House amendment is the residue of the Senate bill just as we passed it originally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Commerce will not insist on his motion. Let us see for one moment what this thing is. Here is a canal, the stock of which is owned by the United States in entirety, except five shares of $100 each. With the exception of $500, the United States is as much the owner of the Louisville and Portland Canal as any Senator on this floor is of his dwelling house; and now it is proposed that we shall not take possession of our own property and fix our own rate of toll until the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, two years hence, shall pass a formal act authorizing us, or empowering us, forsooth, to take possession of that which belongs to us. The whole commerce of the Ohio River is to depend upon the passage by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky of a bill, two years hence, to authorize us to possess and enjoy our own property; and we are to continue in the mean time to be taxed at the rate of fifty cents per ton on every steamer that passes through that canal; and mark it, sir, it is fifty cents per ton whether she has one pound of freight in her or whether she has not, whether she is full of freight or whether she has not a pound of freight in her. The point really involved is, whether we are to continue to pay that onerous duty, far more than five times as much as is necessary to keep the canal in repair, as is admitted on all hands. The question is, whether or not we are to have this burden upon us for two years longer in order to await an act by the Legislature of Kentucky, which, after it was passed, would give us no right that we do not now in equity and justice possess.

It is said there is a large sum of money involved here. What is this large sum of money which this amendment of the House says shall not be paid until the Legislature of Kentucky shall pass a certain act? That sum of money is the debt of the United States this day, and has been the debt of the United States ever since it became the owner of the stock of the company.

Mr. SHERMAN. And we appropriated money to pay it a year ago.

Mr. THURMAN. And the money was appropriated a year ago to pay it. If the United States sees fit to own stock in a corporation, and that corporation owes bonds, pray, is not the United States bound for them as a stockholder? There is no assumption, therefore, of any new debt, no assumption of any debt due by somebody else. It is the debt of the corporation, for which its property is liable, and as that stock and that property is owned by the United States, it is in effect the debt of the United States.

But all this was discussed a year ago, when the appropriation was made, and now we are asked to be put off for two years more, as I said before, simply to await the passage of an act by the Legislature of Kentucky, if it shall see fit to pass such an act, to allow us to enjoy and possess our own property.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I should not say one word on this subject now but for one remark made by the Senator from Ohio, which is, quoting his words, that the amendment, the idea of the House of Representatives, is "monstrous."

Mr. THURMAN. I do not think I used that word in that connection; but if I did not I will now, if it is not disrespectful to the House.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator need not supplement what he has said in order to make very energetic his denunciation of the wantonness or stupidity of which the House must have been guilty in order to entitle itself to the observations he has made.

Now, Mr. President, premising the remark I rose to make, I say that the Senator from Ohio is no more unwilling than I am to place fetters or leave fetters upon the commerce of the Ohio River or the commerce of any other stream that flows anywhere in the Republic. It is not worth while, however, to darken the real question before us by declamation about the extent of the interest involved or about what might happen unless the Louisville Canal were liberated from the tolls now imposed upon it; and therefore I venture to correct the statement which the Senator from Ohio has made by adding to it some very essential things which he has omitted.

Transposing the order of his statement, he remarked that all the questions which were before the House of Representatives were discussed here a year ago. Never. On the contrary, if I may refer to what took place in the House, my colleague, whose name has been associated with this amendment, was taken to task because the facts which he presented had never been known to the Committee on Commerce, and he was required to excuse himself by saying that he had been in formed only then for the first time by telegraph of the most material facts he stated. So it cannot be that this was all discussed a year ago.

More than that, the Senator from Ohio, says, "forsooth, we are not to take possession of our own property till the State of Kentucky passes an act two years hence." I beg to say with great deference to him that I think his statement is mistaken at both ends. In the first place, the question is not merely whether we are to take possession of our own property; and in the next place, the alternative is not whether Kentucky shall pass an act two years hence. The Legislature of Kentucky naturally does not meet for two years, but it has been stated elsewhere, I think with propriety, that if there be a necessity so urgent as is alleged, the Legislature of Kentucky might come together for a day if necessary to cure a defect, if in fact a defect exists.

Now, Mr. President, what is that defect as alleged? Not one raising the question whether we shall go and take possession of our own, but whether we shall pay a very large sum of money for that which cannot become our own by paying the money, or in any way without further legislation by Kentucky. How does the question arise? In 1842, again in 1844, again in 1872, enactments took place in the Legislature of Kentucky. By those enactments conditions are imposed upon the cession of this canal property to the United States. So it has been argued. So I think it will be difficult for the Senator from Ohio to deny. But more than that, it turns out by evidence which I may say is newly discovered—for I believe it was never heard of in either House until within a week—that the State of Kentucky persistently and always, in spite of the action of the Government and of the appropriations which have been made, has continued to tax this canal and its property, and that right, upon the theory of Kentucky, will remain untouched if we pass the present bill. Not only has Kentucky taxed this canal, but the United States has taxed it, and taxed it in recent years. Mr. President, consider the absurdity of the United States taxing its own property, taxing the Capitol, taxing the Treasury Department, or the public buildings of the country, if in truth this great piece of mason-work known as the Louisville Canal be one of the public buildings belonging to the United States. It is an action on the part of the Government speaking louder than words in confirmation of the claim of Kentucky that the title and the ownership of the property is not in the United States, but in a corporatien of the commonwealth within whose domain it exists.

Suits have been brought; a suit is pending now for a large sum of money, according to my memory $114,000, and the common council of Louisville has recently passed a resolution directing the city attorney of Louisville to "suspend"—that I observe is the word employed in the resolution—to suspend that suit brought on claims for delinquent taxes alleged to be due against the canal, and then, in future, in case the United States does certain things, the direction is further that the suit be disposed of.

The amendment of the House of Representatives is founded upon the allegation that should the bill before us become a law the State of Kentucky will retain rights assertable in court and undeniable anywhere, conflicting with the ownership of the General Government, that the State of Kentucky and the city of Louisville will retain the right to bridge the canal where they please, to exercise police power which is argued to mean the whole power and jurisdiction of police over the canal, to do a variety of things which I do not stop to enumerate. The papers are not before me, and I had no expectation at this time or at any time of saying anything in regard to it. My purpose being merely to remind the Senator from Ohio that he makes too scanty a statement, I do not stop to go into particulars; but I say the allegation is that unless we have legislation from the State of Kentucky, a release and extinguishment of Kentucky's rights, despite this bill and despite any other action which we alone can take, there will remain with Kentucky rights which it must be the wish of every Senator who seeks to liberate the canal in question from impositions and burdens to extinguish altogether.

Mr. President, I express no opinion about this. I rose for no such purpose; and I beg the Senator from Ohio to understand that I wage now no argument with him as to where the merits of this question lie. I want simply to do justice to the House, to do justice to the amendment, and to do justice to the facts by bringing to the Senate the information that the question is not so simple, is not so narrow, as might be inferred from the somewhat scanty statement, as I think, which fell from the Senator from Ohio. If it were merely whether we should pause until the Commonwealth of Kentucky in its pleasure should give us an invitation or give us permission to go and take possession of that which we own, well might the Senator say "Forsooth, shall we stop to consider such a question?" But when the inquiry is whether the State of Kentucky has rights which we without her consent cannot cleave down, and whether we are to be unauthorized intruders in attempting to assert the purpose of this legislation, I think it can hardly be well said, "Forsooth, shall we stop to consider such a question?" I say yes, Mr. President. This Senate cannot be so occupied with momentous affairs that there is not a fitting time to consider whether, without the permission of a State, we can authorize the Secretary of War to go into it and take possession of property, and whether without the consent and agreement of a State we can annihilate by an act of our own vested rights of property. If no such intrusion is necessary upon the facts, if no such rights are at stake in the question, by merely pausing to see the length and breadth of the matter, we shall so ascertain, and then our path will be clear; and my interposition is merely to insist that we should see precisely what the facts are, precisely what the law is, and then act as we would act upon any other question worthy of consideration.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, it is a very singular fact that although the State of Kentucky is very ably represented on this floor, neither of her Senators at any time when the subject of this canal has been before the Senate has seen fit to interpose a claim in her behalf; neither of those Senators has seemed to fear that there was any such thing as the United States violating the rights of the State of Kentucky. All the protection of her interests comes from a wholly different quarter of the Union. But let that pass.

The answer to the argument of the Senator from New York might be put almost in one single sentence. The rights of the United States and of Kentucky are fixed now. We are not now bargaining with Kentucky. The bargains have been made, and the rights of the parties are fixed; and therefore I put it to the Senator from New York whether he wants to deprive us of the right to our property until Kentucky shall make a new bargain with us. If Kentucky will have the right to tax this property after it shall come into our hands, she has it by virtue of existing legislation. The considerations that we have given have not included a release by her of the right of taxation. If that be so, do you propose to require of her that she shall give us what we have never demanded of her heretofore? She has agreed to cede to us all that we have asked of her for the consideration that we have proposed to give. Do you say that that bargain shall go for nothing, and that all that has been done shall in effect be destroyed unless she will consent to give more than we ever asked her to give and more than she ever promised to give? That is the question.

If Kentucky has these rights that gentlemen apprehend, she has them now under the legislation of Congress on the one side and the legislation of Kentucky on the other side, and neither the fact of our purchase of this stock nor anything else we can do can deprive her of these rights. Sir, are we to be kept out of the possession of our property for all time, and have the tolls on this canal fixed by five men who have nothing but $500 interest in it and who fix the tolls to suit their own personal interest instead of the interest of the country, because Kentucky will not make a new bargain and surrender something she never promised to give and for which she has received no consideration? Kentucky either cannot tax it, or she has the right to tax it under the law as it stands. If she cannot tax the property, there is no necessity for waiting for a formal relinquishment of her right to tax; and if she has the right to tax it under the existing bargain, then you have no right to deprive her of that power.

The whole thing, turn it as you will, twist it as you may, comes back simply to the question which I stated at first. This canal company was a corporation. Of course it had shares of stock. The United States was a stockholder, I believe from the very first. The United States has become the owner of the entire stock, with the exception of five shares of $100 each. It is the property of the United States; and the sole question is whether we shall administer our own property for the interest of the people of the United States, or whether we shall allow five men to block up the navigation of that river by administering that property in their own individual interest.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] would seem to be somewhat anxious to place me in opposition to the measure, and even in opposition to the interests of commerce on the Ohio River. I hardly think the Senator has time to expend in that way. I notice, however, the apparent attempt to do so, in order to say to him that he may rely upon it that, despite any opposition which he may attribute to me, I shall vote for that which as I apprehend will be most certain to liberate the commerce of the Ohio River from all burdens; and will vote for this very bill if it turns out to be the appropriate and adequate remedy. I have not made an argument, as the Senator said in commencing his remarks; there is a vast difference between an argument and a mere statement of the question. It was the latter which I attempted to make in a very inadequate and partial manner; but certainly I made no argument. I mean to make none now; and yet I must take issue again with the Senator from Ohio.

He says, first, that Kentucky does not complain. I might inquire, why should Kentucky complain? If we choose to plant in the State of Kentucky $1,300,000, or, as my friend behind me [Mr. CHANDLER] thinks it is, $1,700,000, and subject it to the behests of Kentucky, and submit it to her power of taxation, I see not why Kentucky should complain. I rather think the Senators from any State represented here would feel warranted in withholding their hands and submitting with Christian resignation, if the United States should choose, by the action of the two Houses of Congress, to invest two or three million dollars in the State from which they come, subject to the taxation of the State. The question in such a case would seem to me to address itself, not to the interest, not to the State espousal, not to the local feeling of the Senators from Kentucky, but rather to the general judgment of the Senate as to what would be wholesome and wise.

Again, the Senator from Ohio says the rights of Kentucky are fixed; if Kentucky has a right to tax this canal, we cannot take away the right. So I said; and I thought that suggestion would "give us pause" when the question is whether we shall pay a million and a half for this canal, and pay it before we secure, if in truth it be necessary to secure, exemption from taxation for the canal. And yet the honorable Senator from Ohio discusses it as if we did enough when we find that as the tree has fallen, so will it lie; if Kentucky has absolute police power over the canal, absolute power to bridge it as it pleases, absolute power to tax it as it pleases, that power and prerogative being with her Legislature, we have nothing to do with it. That seems to be his argument.

Why, Mr. President, to my mind the fallacy of that suggestion is as the fallacy would be if my honorable friend from Ohio should propose to sell me his farm, reserving the right after he had sold it and I had paid for it to use it and enjoy it and exercise all former rights of ownership over it; and then it should be said, "What of it? That is no reason why the bargain should not be completed." I submit that it would be every reason which would govern human judgment in such a transaction. So here, if it be true, as the Senator from Ohio says, that the right of Kentucky to tax the canal will be untouched by this action; and if this action consist of a voluntary payment by the Government of $1,300,000 or $1,700,000, manifestly the urgent question accosting us is whether we will not require that, preliminary to the payment, or simultaneous with the payment, of this great sum, action shall be taken by Kentucky which will give to us the value for which we pay.

I say again that I am not contending that Kentucky has this power. I express no opinion about it. I simply say that upon the argument that such power resides with Kentucky, one House of Congress has found that it would be improvident to consummate this legislation until that power is relinquished or extinguished; and so I say that it behooves the Senate to treat the question as it would treat any matter of importance, to the end that the Senator from Ohio or some other Senator may show us that there is no danger in this respect, or, if there be danger, may devise some provision to guard against it. That is all.

I say again, Mr. President, that in my belief this very important channel of commerce should be emancipated from the control of individuals, should not be enslaved by self-interest or burdened by impositions upon commerce; and in the maintenance of that belief, I will go as far with the Senator from Ohio as sound sense, as good faith, as reasonable legislative discretion will allow me to go. But I will not consent to "whistle down the wind" as "monstrous," in the language of the Senator, the suggestion that this question is worthy of examination, and worthy of intelligent decision.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are a few simple facts in regard to this matter which I think would settle it if they were fully understood; but this question being somewhat local in its character it is difficult perhaps to excite the attention of the Senate generally to it. The real ownership of the Louisville and Portland Canal is entirely in the Government of the United States. The history of that ownership has been stated properly by my colleague. In 1872, only two years ago, the United States, having completed its improvements, proposed to take possession of the canal, and then a proposition was made and invited from the State of Kentucky as to the terms on which this cession could be made. Here I invite the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the proposition of the State of Kentucky. The preamble recites—although I have not got it here I can state it substantially—that the United States is the exclusive owner of this property, subject to the ownership of one share in each of the five trustees in trust for the United States, and subject to a debt of about $1,100,000, the precise amount of which is stated in the bill; and then the Legislature of Kentucky proceeds to resolve—

That the president and directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company are hereby authorized and directed to surrender the said canal, and all the property connected therewith, to the Government of the United States, upon the following terms and conditions.

And then follow four or five ordinary stipulations about reserving the police jurisdiction and matters of no great moment. I can read them all if it be necessary; and perhaps I had better read them all, so that the Senate may see the exact terms:

1. That the Government of the United States shall not levy tolls on said canal, except such as shall be necessary to keep the same in repair, pay all necessary superintendence, custody, and expenses, and make all necessary improvements.
2. That the city of Louisville shall have the right to throw bridges over the canal at such points as said city may deem proper: Provided always, That said bridges shall be so located as not to interfere with the use of the canal, and so constructed as not to interfere with its navigation.
3. That the title and possession of the United States of said canal shall not interfere with the right of the State to serve criminal and civil processes, or with the State's general police power over the territory covered by the said canal and its appendages.
4. And further, that the city of Louisville shall at all times have the right of drainage into said canal: Provided, That the connections between the drains and the canal shall be made upon the plan to keep out mud and garbage.
5. That the use of the water-power of the canal shall be guaranteed forever to the actual owners of the property contiguous to said canal, its branches and dams, subject to such restrictions and regulations as may be made by the Secretary of the Department of the United States Government which may have charge of the said canal.

This was the form of the Kentucky resolution pending when Mr. Speed, formerly Attorney-General of the United States, went to Frankfort and ingrafted as an addition the clause which I will read, and which has created all the embarrassment in this case. It must be remembered that this property, costing the Government of the United States over $5,000,000, is now in the hands of five men claiming to act as trustees who levy the enormous toll of fifty cents a ton capacity on every vessel that passes through. They receive that money; they account to no one; they deposit it in a bank owned by them, and every one of those trustees is an officer of the corporation, drawing a salary as such. Mr. Speed being attorney for the corporation, and interested in the continuance of this private monopoly levying a taxation that is more oppressive than was ever levied upon the river Rhine in the days of the barons of old—fifty cents a ton, amounting to about $500 for every steamboat, and levying a dollar a ton on every coal-barge passing through the canal—Mr. Speed acting as attorney for the company, although this was the property of the United States, went to Frankfort and got ingrafted on this resolution of the Kentucky Legislature the clause which I will now read. I may state that he said so in the presence of my friend from New York and myself as members of the Transportation Committee. We examined the matter, and Mr. Speed gave this narrative himself. This clause was added at his suggestion:

6. That the Government of the United States shall, before such surrender, discharge all the debts due by said canal company, and purchase the stock of said directors.

This being plausible on its face, the Government of the United States accepted the terms of this cession. By a law passed a year ago we agreed to accept the cession of the Louisville and Portland Canal on the terms stated here, so that now there is a completed agreement in all respects between Kentucky and the United States for the ownership and possession of this canal; but here the difficulty lies: when the Secretary of the Treasury undertook to take possession of the canal he was met by the statement that the bondholders, the bonds being held by a great number of persons, would not surrender their bonds unless on certain terms and conditions, and because the Secretary of the Treasury did not think it was to the interest of the United States to comply with the terms and conditions proposed by the bondholders he could not take possession of the canal, for this sixth clause required him to pay the debts of the company. Those debts are bonded debts, and none of them are yet due, and some of them are not due for fifteen years to come. Therefore, under the sixth clause of this resolution of cession, the United States cannot take possession of the canal until the last bond is due, even if the United States were willing to pay par in gold and 500 per cent. premium. That is the condition in which this qualification has put both the United States and the State of Kentucky.

The feeling in Kentucky, in Louisville and everywhere else, is that the United States should take possession of the canal. Indeed Kentucky demands that we should now, having accepted its cession, carry out the terms and conditions of the cession and reduce the tolls. One of the conditions of this cession is that the tolls shall be reduced to barely enough to cover the mere expenses of management. The people of Kentucky—and I am sorry that my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] is not here to represent them—are just as anxious to carry out this arrangement as the people of Ohio and the people of the whole Ohio Valley.

The sole and only object of this bill was to remove the difficulty which grows out of the sixth clause of the Kentucky resolution. We have provided by the bill, as it was reported by the Committee on Finance and passed by the Senate, that instead of buying these bonds the United States assumes them, the money already having been appropriated to pay them. In order that the United States may not be placed at the mercy of these bondholders the bill provides that the United States assumes the payment of these bonds, having already appropriated the money and received and accepted the canal subject to the payment of these bonds when they mature. That enables the Government of the United States to take possession of its own, subject to the lien of the bonds and subject to their payment when due. The bondholders have made no complaint about this matter. Their interests are perfectly protected. Their lien is protected. There is no complaint coming from anybody in Kentucky about this matter, and there is no opposition to this measure of a local character except so far as these five trustees manifestly have an interest. But this amendment which has been proposed comes from a member of the House from the State of New York. I have read his speech with care. He desires that before the United States shall take possession of its own Kentucky shall consent to some other terms and conditions not imposed in this law. If such a transaction were to occur between private parties and one of the parties being dissatisfied with the agreement should say, "I will not carry out this unless you give me some other advantage, some other facility," the answer would be very prompt, "You have already agreed to the terms of the cession upon which you would receive this canal, take possession of it, and manage it for the benefit of the people of the United States, without any tolls except sufficient to cover expenses." Kentucky might promptly so respond; but in Kentucky they understand distinctly that they have no power to tax the canal, and it has been so asserted in the State; but whether they have or not, I consider that point entirely immaterial now. The gentleman who reported this bill in the House, the bill being under the previous question and he having the control of the debate, practically allowed no discussion after this amendment was offered. He offered the amendment, and it was added to the bill.

Now, if the Legislature of Kentucky was in session, if there was no great delay caused by this, I have no doubt the State of Kentucky would promptly accede to the modification proposed by this amendment. But the fact is that for two years that Legislature cannot be in session under their constitution, unless called for a special purpose, and the people of Kentucky have no more interest in this matter than the other people of the United States, and it would be rather unreasonable to impose on the Commonwealth of Kentucky, she having already consented and done all we desired her to do, the necessity of calling the Legislature in extra session for the purpose of passing a law to agree to additional terms and considerations to a proposition that has already been accepted by the United States. Therefore the passage of this amendment, whether so intended or not, will delay for two years the taking possession of this canal, and will compel the people of the whole Ohio Valley to pay this enormous toll on their entire commerce for two years. These trustees disregard your law. The Senator from Michigan reported a bill which reduced this toll to twenty-five cents a ton. These trustees having the bare, naked ownership of this canal, disobeyed your law, declared that you had no power to pass it until you accepted conditions of the State of Kentucky, disregarded it, and continued to levy fifty cents per ton, instead of twenty-five cents, according to the law the Senator from Michigan reported. They have the legal control of it, and until the Government of the United States take possession, you cannot pass any law in regard to it, because, although they have really only a mere technical ownership, yet they have an ownership which they can maintain in the courts.

Now, if this bill is sent to a committee of conference an amendment can be proposed which in my judgment will be consented to by every member of the Senate. In the heat of debate, after the previous question had been called in the House, there was an amendment suggested by a member from the State of Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] which I should be perfectly willing to accept, representing the people of Ohio, who are so much interested in this matter, and which I have no doubt, if there had been an opportunity for debate in the House, (at least I am so informed,) would have prevailed. I will read it. Remember, the only question being now as to whether the taking possession of the canal shall be postponed until the Legislature of Kentucky meets, the proposition that is pending now ingrafted on this bill, that the United States will not take possession for two years, until the Legislature of Kentucky meet and agree to the modification of the terms of cession—pending that, the member from Pennsylvania offered this proposition, to which I do not see any objection:

Provided further, That if the State of Kentucky shall not cede to the United States jurisdiction over said canal, with all its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, and relinquish to the United States the right of said State to tax or in any way assess said canal, its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, or the property of the United States that may be thereon, during the time that the United States shall remain owner thereof, at or during the time of the first session of the Legislature of said State held after the passage of this act, that then the United States shall levy and collect tolls on said canal at the rate of the existing tariff of tolls on said canal until the United States shall be reimbursed and repaid in full for all moneys paid and expended by virtue of this act and until such cession is made.

I would modify this somewhat. In my judgment, if the State of Kentucky insists upon levying a tax on this canal, and if it should be held by the courts of the United States that the result of this compact and agreement between Kentucky and the United States reserved to the State of Kentucky the power to levy a tax on this property of the United States, and the State of Kentucky should exercise that power, which I do not believe would be done, then I am perfectly willing that the tax thus paid to the State of Kentucky shall be added to the ordinary expenses of the canal, and the whole be levied as a toll on commerce. By the law as it stands, all the expenses of maintaining this canal are still levied in the nature of a tonnage tax; and if the State of Kentucky can levy a tax on this property, that will be part of the expenses of management and there would be no difficulty in adding it to the amount of toll to be collected from the commerce of the Ohio River.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my colleague allow me a moment to make a suggestion to him? He is supposing a case that is not supposable. I have looked a little into this matter of whether Kentucky can tax this canal, and I say it is perfectly clear, on the legislation of Kentucky herself, that she cannot tax this property. The statute of Kentucky of 1842, which was an invitation to the Government of the United States to purchase the stock of the company, and which authorized the sale of the stock to the Government of the United States, contains this provision:

And when the said shares shall have all been purchased, the same shall be transferred to the Government of the United States, on condition of said Government levying tolls for the use of said canal only sufficient to keep the same in repair.

That is a fundamental condition; and of course if the Government is not to levy tolls to pay taxes, it cannot do it by this very fundamental condition.

Mr. SHERMAN. I had forgotten that law, although I have no doubt I have read it. It seems to me the statute of Kentucky read by my colleague precludes the idea. I do not suppose ten members of the Legislature of Kentucky, when this property was taken possession of by the Government of the United States for their benefit, would think of taxing it. I do not believe the General Assembly of Kentucky would propose to levy a tax on this canal in the hands of the United States. As long as it was the property of private individuals, managed by private trustees, and a large profit made by those trustees out of its management and the tolls levied, the State of Kentucky might tax the property of that corporation like the property of any other corporation; but when that property is taken possession of by the Government of the United States I have not the slightest idea that any proposition will be made to tax it; but if such a proposition should be made, it is at once met by the law already read by my colleague.

Now, I beg the Senate to remember that this incumbrance—and my friend from New York saw it—this incumbrance to the navigation of the Ohio affects about ten States, nearly one-half the people of the United States directly. The amount of that commerce is estimated by statistics laid before the Committee on Transportation, when reduced even to the lowest amount, to be more than $1,000,000,000; and all of that must necessarily, in nearly all the stages of water on the Ohio River, pass through this canal. This incumbrance has been regarded, ever since I can remember anything, as one of the most burdensome things that could possibly occur. I trust now, when we have an opportunity to relieve from this load so large a portion of the people and a commerce so large, we shall do it by completing this legislation. Hitherto we have been balked at every step by the private interests we have created; and if any lesson is required to teach us never to trust to an individual corporation to manage the property interests of the United States, we have in this case of the Louisville and Portland Canal another striking example. The idea that five men, without a dollar invested there, without a particle of interest, when every dollar of the property is owned by the United States, are now managing without restraint and without account a property that cost us $5,000,000, and levying a tax so burdensome on commerce as that which has been stated, is a thing that ought immediately to attract the attention of the Senate. This bill is intended at least to remove this "Old Man of the Sea" from the commerce of the Ohio, and to give to the United States and the officers of the United States possession of this property, levying only sufficient tolls to pay the ordinary current expenses of managing the property.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the arguments of both Senators from Ohio must convince every member of this body that the subject should be carefully considered by some committee of the Senate. We have put within the last five or six years something over two millions of money into this canal. If we have placed it there subject to taxation by the State of Kentucky we have made a very grave mistake. We ought never to have done that. Now it is proposed to put considerably over a million more funds of the Treasury of the United States into the jurisdiction of Kentucky. I think we should know, before we put another dollar there, whether it is to be under the control of the Government of the United States or of the State of Kentucky. Why, sir, you do not build a light-house in any State in this Union that you do not have jurisdiction ceded by the State to the United States before you lay a stone or a brick.

Mr. THURMAN. The Legislature of Kentucky passed two acts ceding jurisdiction to us.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let us examine them and see whether they are proper acts. The whole subject in my judgment requires careful investigation by some committee of this body. Most of these appropriations were recommended by the Committee on Commerce in the river and harbor bill. I therefore move its reference to that committee, and certainly some committee of the body should carefully examine this whole question and report on it to the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, reluctant to intrude once more upon the Senate, I think I ought to do so in consequence of a remark made by the Senator from Ohio who sits fartherest from me, [Mr. THURMAN.] He rather chided his colleague for discussing even as a hypothesis the idea of Kentucky having the power to tax the canal and attempting to forecast what might happen in case the courts should affirm that power; and reading the act of 1842 the Senator said "no such case can arise; it is impossible, because Kentucky has already" clearly—that was his argument if he did not say it—"released the right to tax and forever extinguished it." As the Senator from Ohio nearest me [Mr. SHERMAN] has referred to the proceedings in the House, and as I have no other record to refer to, I beg to call attention to what that record shows, first asking the Senate to bear in mind that the parties concerned are on the one side the United States and on the other the State of Kentucky; and a singular occurrence, if the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] be right, is that although there was no right in Kentucky to tax this property because it belonged to the United States, and although there was no sense in the United States taxing it because it was its own, both parties have concurred in taxing it as the property of the State of Kentucky. Is not that very odd if in 1842 it ceased to be the property of Kentucky, or if the power to tax it terminated absolutely?

Mr. THURMAN. Nobody has said that.

Mr. CONKLING. What did my honorable friend say?

Mr. THURMAN. Nobody said that in 1842 it ceased to be the property of the company. The act of 1842 gave the consent of Kentucky to the United States becoming the owner of stock in that company, but it took years after that.

Mr. CONKLING. When did it happen that the United States became owner?

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot tell without referring to the documents.

Mr. CONKLING. A short time after that?

Mr. THURMAN. No; a long time after it.

Mr. CONKLING. Why, Mr. President, the United States at that time had become the owner of part of this stock.

Mr. THURMAN. It was impossible to get it.

Mr. CONKLING. A short time after that the United States began to increase its ownership of stock, so that whether it was in the year 1842 or not, it was prior to the period as to which I am going to read that that law took effect, if it ever took effect, which the Senator from Ohio says made this the property of the United States and cut off the power of the State of Kentucky to tax it; and yet that law, now so clear that no Senator would doubt it, we are told, having taken effect, both the United States and the State of Kentucky, I repeat, concurred in visiting this property with taxation and treating it as the property of the Commonwealth of Kentucky. Now I read from the remarks of my colleague in the House, the remarks to which my friend from Ohio referred:

Mr. WHEELER. * * * From 1846 to 1853 the State of Kentucky taxed this property systematically, as I will show you. Let one instance suffice for all. In the report of the canal company for 1846 this remark occurs:

"It will be noticed by an item in this account that the State of Kentucky has taxed the entire property and franchises of the canal; consequently no stockholder can be holden to give in the amount of his stock for taxation, and thus be subjected to a double tax."

Mr. HOLMAN.—

Mr. HOLMAN being the member having the bill in charge at the time—

Mr. HOLMAN. I would ask the gentleman whether he laid this information before the committee?

Mr. WHEELER. I did not. I did not have it when the bill was in committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. What document is the gentleman reading from, and where did it come from?

I beg my friend from Ohio farthest from me [Mr. THURMAN] to observe what follows in relation to his remark that all this was discussed before the Senate and discussed a year ago. It will be observed that here was a challenge of the genuineness of this evidence newly discovered.

Mr. WHEELER. It is a volume containing the reports of the company.

Mr. HOLMAN. Who furnished it?

Mr. WHEELER. I beg to say to the gentleman that I have the right to fortify myself in this debate with such facts and arguments as are within my reach. I am responsible to the House for the truth of my allegations. And I say that from 1846 to 1853 the State of Kentucky systematically taxed this canal, and the United States itself taxed it during the war. Look at the report for 1866, and you will find this assertion substantiated.

Mr. MORTON. How was it after 1853?

Mr. CONKLING. I will come to that in one moment:

And I say that from 1846 to 1853 the State of Kentucky systematically taxed this canal, and the United States itself taxed it during the war. Look at the report for 1866, and you will find this assertion substantiated. Surely a strange proceeding, that the United States, having become owners of this property in 1855, as is claimed by the gentleman from Indiana, should tax it in 1866. When before did the Government of the United States ever tax its own property?

I pass on to read this further statement:

I have here the report of the canal company for the year 1866, in which I find this concluding remark:

I think the Senator from Indiana asked me how it was after 1853. Here now I read:

The taxes paid in those two years (1865 and 1866) were also unusually heavy, amounting in the former year to $11,698, of which $7,676 went to the United States, and in the latter to $10,430, of which $6,430 went to the United States.

Now, Mr. President, we cannot wink so hard as not to see that here is a case in which the United States and the State of Kentucky concurrently and simultaneously have affirmed by that highest power, the power to visit with taxation, that this property did belong to the State of Kentucky; and that time, let it be remembered, was subsequent to the time when the acts of 1842 and 1844 and the proceedings by which they were followed had taken all the effect that they have to-day.

Mr. MORTON. Let me ask the Senator under what law and in what way did the United States tax the canal?

Mr. SHERMAN. Like any other corporation.

Mr. McCREERY. Let me ask the gentleman from New York if the canal was not the property of a private corporation at the time those taxes were imposed?

Mr. CONKLING. Being hardly a judge of this matter from lack of information, I say to the Senator from Kentucky that that was the argument of my colleague in the House, and that was the argument upon which the House adopted this amendment; that was the argument upon which the House said that we could not of our mere motion upon our one-sided action, go into the State of Kentucky, and take from the Commonwealth of Kentucky and from a private corporation created by it the franchises and property representing this canal and make them our own merely by appropriating that great sum of money contained in this bill and by arming the Secretary of War with such power as is found in those words which declare that he is authorized to take possession of this work. Why the Secretary of War rather than the Secretary of the Treasury, who has always administered this business before, was authorized, I do not know unless it was to be under the war power.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator if the act of the Kentucky Legislature of 1842 is correctly recited here? I have not got the act itself, but I find it quoted in the House debate.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no reason to doubt it, but I have no information on the subject.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from New York has only got a part of the statute.

Mr. SCOTT. I have the act of 1842 before me.

Mr. MORTON. That is the one I want to see.

Mr. SCOTT. I had got it in order to call attention to the purpose for which it was enacted. With the permission of the Senator from New York I will read the first section in connection with that section from which quotation is made in the debate to which he has referred. The first section reads thus:

That the act incorporating the Louisville and Portland Canal Company shall be, and the same is hereby, so amended that, whenever the stockholders in said company shall so direct, the board of president and directors of said company shall have the privilege of selling the shares of stock owned by individuals in said canal to the United States, or the State of Kentucky, or the city of Louisville, for the purpose of eventually making the said canal free of tolls; or, further, to effect this object, the board of president and directors, when so authorized as aforesaid, shall hereby have the privilege of appropriating the net income arising from said canal to the purchase of said stock instead of making dividends therewith.

That is the first section. The fourth section reads:

Be it further enacted, That the shares so purchased by said board shall be held in trust by it, for the purposes herein declared, and shall be voted on by them at all subsequent meetings and elections, until, by the operation of the provisions of this act, all the shares standing in the name of others than the Government of the United States shall have been purchased up; and when the said shares shall be all purchased, the same shall be transferred to the Government of the United States, on condition of said Government levying tolls for the use of said canal, only sufficient to keep the same in repair, and pay all necessary superintendence, custody, and expenses, and make all necessary improvements, so as fully to answer the purposes of its establishment; and, further to protect and guard the interests of commerce, the superintendents or agents in charge of said canal shall ever hereafter, on the first Monday in January, annually, report to the General Assembly of Kentucky the amount of tolls levied and received, and of the charges and expenses incurred on the same—the General Assembly reserving the right of directing the amount annually to be collected, if found too much for the purposes contemplated by this amended act.

That the whole legislation may be here incorporated, I will also read the act of 1844:

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That in the event of the United States becoming the sole owner of the Louisville and Portland Canal, the jurisdiction of this Commonwealth over said canal shall be yielded up to the Government of the United States; and no annual report, as mentioned in the charter of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, shall be required to be made by the United States, or the agents and superintendents of said canal, to the General Assembly of this Commonwealth.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to read to the Senator from New York now, so that we may have the facts, the statement made before us by Attorney-General Speed, giving the history of this matter at Louisville.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend need not read it for my information, as I have it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will read it presently to place it on record.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Ohio fartherest from me [Mr. THURMAN] spoke so sweetly and so softly a moment ago that I fear the reporter lost a fact stated by him, namely, that I knew nothing about this matter, and that there was no force whatever in my argument. I wish to put that fact into the case on the other side, thinking that it is entitled to all the strength which belongs to it; and I also observe upon it that if I know nothing about this case, and if I shall learn nothing about it, that misfortune will be mainly due to the triumphant management of the honorable Senator from Ohio fartherest from me, who seems to be willing to agree to almost anything under the sun on this subject, except that the measure shall go to a committee, or somewhere else where it can be understood, and where a report can be made so plain that even I can comprehend it. It is so difficult for the whole Senate to act intelligently upon information locked up in the breast of one member of it, that it seems to me that if we could take some mode of diffusing all over the Senate the information which now resides especially with one of the Senators from Ohio, we might gain some light by reflection or otherwise in that way.

Coming back now to these acts which have been read by my friend from Pennsylvania, both of which bear upon the subject before us, I observe that they prove, as I understand them, much of that which was contended for in the other House. Why? The act of 1842, which the Senator first read, refers to what shall occur upon a transfer of shares of stock. I understand, and I am informed just now again by very good authority, that every share of stock to this day stands where it stood on the books; there has been no transfer of ownership. On the contrary, those shares of stock paid for originally by the revenues of the canal remain precisely in the ownership in which that payment placed them. That is my comment upon the act of 1842.

Next the Senator comes to the act of 1844, which provides that whenever ownership shall be made over by Kentucky to the United States, jurisdiction shall cease on the part of Kentucky over the canal.

Mr. SCOTT. Will my friend permit me to call his attention to a recital in the act of the Legislature on that question of ownership?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. On the 28th of March, 1872, the Legislature of Kentucky passed the following resolution:

Whereas all the stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal belongs to the United States Government, except five shares owned by the directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and said directors, under the authority of the legislation of Kentucky and the United States, executed a mortgage to Isaac Caldwell and Dean Richmond to secure bonds, &c.

This recital would seem to acknowledge on the part of the State of Kentucky that the United States is the owner of all the shares of stock in that canal but five.

Mr. CONKLING. It would seem to acknowledge that which is too notorious to be a subject of comment, namely, that in equity all this stock, five shares excepted, belongs to the United States; but when we are discussing the effect of the statute nobody can instruct my astute friend as to the fact that the question is in a measure technical, and at this point it involves the inquiry whether the particular thing nominated in the statute has taken place; and I say again that I am informed that upon the books of the company the shares remain where the shares of stock were. I know nothing about it; I never saw the books; but I make the statement as it is given to me, and make it for the purpose of saying that it is one point in the case which it might be desirable to investigate and ascertain.

Mr. SCOTT. If my friend will permit me, if he will follow this act of 1872, he will see that it provides—

That the president and directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal are hereby authorized and directed to surrender the said canal, and all the property connected therewith, to the Government of the United States, upon the following terms and conditions, &c.

And if it be true that the United States is in equity the owner, would my friend standing here and, making a technical question upon this, say that if a court were called upon to pass on the question they would not consider that as done which ought to be done, and the beneficial owner of this stock as entitled to all the remedies he would have if it were transferred to him on the books, supposing that to be the case?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, Mr. President, instructed only as I am I should stand up here or anywhere to maintain a proposition which I now state. The statute of Kentucky declaring—

And when the said shares shall be all purchased, the same shall be transferred to the Government of the United States on condition of said Government levying tolls for the use of said canal only sufficient to keep the same in repair and pay all necessary superintendence, custody, and expenses, and make the necessary improvements, so as fully to answer the purposes of its establishment—and following with other conditions; that being the statute; and the fact, as I understand it, being that although the certificates of stock have been surrendered, no actual transfer of the stock has ever been made, I should say that a question arises whether the rights there contemplated have become perfect and consummate in the United States. That is all I mean to say. I disclaim over again arguing this question on either side. I am merely now endeavoring to impress upon the Senate the belief that there is that here worthy of some examination.

So, coming to the act of 1844 which provides that upon the ownership being made over, the jurisdiction of the State of Kentucky shall cease, I say that goes back to a question of fact, results in a question of fact, and a somewhat complicated question of fact. If the conditions have all been complied with, and no other legislation is necessary, the whole thing is concluded; but if, on the other hand, other legislation was contemplated, or if the conditions have not been complied with, then a question arises upon that statute.

But, Mr. President, I take leave, I hope, finally of this subject—I am very sorry to have vexed the ear of the Senate so long—by saying that one great fact stands out like a sunbeam in this case; nobody can fail to observe it; and that is, that after 1842, after 1844, after 1853, after 1855, after every period which marks a step in the acquisition of rights by the United States, both the United States and the Commonwealth of Kentucky have concurred in treating not merely in words, but by acts speaking louder than words, the Louisville Canal as the property not of the United States, but of the State of Kentucky. I say that since the last of these acts of which the record speaks, I know of nothing changing the status except the resolutions passed in 1872, for which I will trouble my friend from Pennsylvania if he has them before him, and those resolutions contain a variety of conditions which certainly present a substantial question, not a technical question, to the Senate, whether, submitting to them all, it is wise to vote this money. I shall not advert to them all; but I beg to call attention to two of them.

First, the Government shall not levy tolls above a prescribed sum.

Secondly, "the city of Louisville shall have the right to throw bridges over the canal at such points as said city may deem proper."

I stop there for a moment. I will read the proviso in a moment. Is it not somewhat anomalous that a State should have a right to bridge, intrude upon, control the property of the United States, bought and paid for out and out, whether it be a navigable stream or anything else?

Provided always, That said bridges shall be so located as not to interfere with the use of the canal, and so constructed as not to interfere with its navigation.

Who is to judge of that? I should like to ask you, sir, who is to judge of that upon this statute? Is the United States to litigate in court with the State of Kentucky the question whether some erection is an impediment to commerce, whether it is that which at common law could be prostrated as a nuisance? No arbiter is here. It is a naked and somewhat vague proviso, with no tribunal to solve the questions raised in it.

The city of Louisville shall at all times have the right of drainage into said canal: Provided, That the connections between the drains and the canal shall be made upon the plan to keep out mud and garbage.

That is rather odd. Who is to determine that? It is very well when you arrive at it; but in considering that this is our own property, that we are buying it and making it our own, it is rather odd that somebody is to have a right to drain into it with simply the provision that he do not fill it up with mud and garbage, and that it is left to somebody, we know not who to determine that question.

That the use of the water-power of the canal shall be guaranteed forever to the actual owners of the property contiguous to said canal, its branches and dams, subject to such restrictions and regulations as may be made by the Secretary of the Department of the United States Government which may have charge of the said canal.

The Government of the United States shall, before such surrender, discharge all the debts due by said canal company, and purchase the stock of said directors.

I remark upon those conditions that they are very remarkable if the case be one in which the property is really ours, or even one in which it is to become absolutely ours if we appropriate the money contemplated by this bill.

I think it would be quite prudent that we should investigate the whole case; and I assure the Senator who has been most enthusiastic in it that I will go as far as he will go in insuring once for all, without leaving open questions hereafter, the substance and essence of this thing, namely, a liberation of the commerce of the Ohio River from all unnecessary impositions, to the end that the utmost accommodation may be afforded which the circumstances permit.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I see no occasion to make a very great mystery of this subject or to asssume that there are great complications or difficulties surrounding it. I confess I do not see them. The history of this canal is this: Many years ago the Legislature of Kentucky chartered a company with the consent of the United States, to construct a canal around the Falls of the Ohio River. That charter provided that the United States might subscribe to and hold a part of the stock. The Government of the United States did subscribe and become a part owner of the stock. Subsequently it became the owner of all the stock and the owner of the canal, except technically that five shares, one each, remained in five persons who were thereby the directors of the company. All the substantial interest of the canal passed into the United States, but as a mere form of law and to keep the corporation alive, and for no other purpose, five persons were each allowed to hold one share of stock—$500. The substantial property, the interest, and control of the whole canal, passed into the United States from that time.

Now, I wish to read the act of the Kentucky Legislature under which this took place:

That the act incorporating the Louisville and Portland Canal Company shall be and the same is hereby, so amended that, whenever the stockholders in said company shall so direct, the board of president and directors of said company shall have the privilege of selling the shares of stock owned by individuals in said canal to the United States, or the State of Kentucky, or the city of Louisville, for the purpose of eventually making the said canal free of tolls; or, further, to effect this object, the board of president and directors, when so authorized as aforesaid, shall hereby have the privilege of appropriating the net income arising from said canal to the purchase of said stock instead of making dividends therewith.

Here this canal company was authorized to buy up this stock for the United States or for the State of Kentucky. Congress passed an act authorizing the directors to buy it up for the United States, and it was bought for the United States, and the property has been held by the United States ever since. It became a matter of contract. It was provided that whenever the United States became the owner of all this stock the jurisdiction over the canal should pass to the United States. The effect of that contract was, that whenever the Government of the United States chose, in addition to what she had done, to pay $500 to these five directors, buying up the last five shares, she would become not only the owner, but the absolute manager in the control of the canal. This is a matter of contract. The State of Kentucky cannot go back on it. It may pass as many new conditions as it pleases; that makes no difference. By a contract with the State of Kentucky the Government of the United States became the owner of all but five shares more than twenty years ago, and had a right to take possession of the canal whenever it chose to buy out the remaining five shares; and this act contains an appropriation for buying out the remaining five shares. Whenever the Government does so, it has a right to take absolute possession, and it is not in the power of the Legislature of Kentucky to impose any new conditions. All of these new conditions imposed by the act of 1872 are in absolute violation of the contract made with the United States; and I call the attention of the Senator from New York to that fact.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator how it happens that the taxation by both governments occurred long after the prior rights to which he has referred?

Mr. MORTON. I expect that, in the prosecution of the war and the multiplicity of business, officers of the United States had not always a very much clearer comprehension of this subject in dealing with it than a good many Senators of the United States; and the Legislature of Kentucky may also have acted in the same way. But there it is now; there is no getting over that; that the Legislature of Kentucky, as long ago as 1842, authorized the Government of the United States to become the owner of this canal, and it did become the owner of it; and it is not in the power of the State of Kentucky to impose any new conditions upon it. How are we to get over that? My friend says it is notorious that the United States has for years owned all that stock but five shares. A mere technical interest remained in that corporation for certain purposes; but the substantial control all the time has been with the United States.

Why, sir, when the bonds were issued by that corporation subsequently to enlarge the canal, they were issued under the operation of an act of Congress expressly authorizing that corporation to do it, and there was another act of Congress, which I have before me, empowering that corporation to use the dividends for the purpose of constructing an enlargement of the canal. The substantial management has been with the United States all the time, and there has been no question but that the whole interest was with the Government, and a mere technical interest remained in that corporation which under the original contract the Government of the United States had a right to take possession of at any time by buying out the remaining five shares. I remember urging here, I believe in concert with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] some four or five years ago, that those five shares ought to be bought and the Government take possession and control of the whole thing.

When the Legislature of Kentucky in 1872, under manipulation, too, as I have no doubt, and without a very clear knowledge of how this thing stood, passed the act just referred to by the Senator from New York, it was in absolute derogation and violation of the original contract; they were imposing terms and conditions upon property in which they had no interest at all. It was absurd for them to do it, to make new terms that the city of Louisville should be allowed to bridge that canal and should be allowed to empty her sewers into it, and this, that, and the other thing. Now mark it:

That the use of the water-power of the canal shall be guaranteed forever.

And further:

That the Government of the United States shall, before such surrender, discharge all the debts due by said canal company, and purchase the stock of said directors.

Purchasing the stock was the original condition, and that was all there was of it; and whenever the Government did that the absolute control of the canal came to the Government, and every other condition is a nullity.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What is the date of that act?

Mr. MORTON. It was in 1872, long after the Government of the United States had been making appropriations for this canal, and large ones, from year to year, in view of the original contract that had been made.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend allow me to read an extract from the testimony of Attorney-General Speed, as the legal history of this matter?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to this statement. The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] seemed to be in doubt as to when the United States had finally got possession of the last of this stock. It was in 1857. Mr. Speed then gives the history of the matter, as follows:

Now the thing thus stood in 1857, with these five directors having the canal and holding it in trust for the Government of the United States under a Kentucky charter. The business of the country absolutely demanded that the canal should be enlarged. They got this act passed through the Kentucky Legislature, and then came the doubt whether, as the revenues belonged to the Government of the United States, it was competent for the Legislature to appropriate those revenues in that way.

Congress then, in 1860, after years of application, passed a resolution authorizing the revenues and credit of the company to be used for enlarging the said canal, and to construct a branch canal. So, under the act of 1857 and under the resolution of Congress of 1860, the directors proceeded to enlarge the canal. They used up the funds which they had on hand, and under the authority of the Kentucky Legislature and under the resolution of Congress they made a mortgage on the revenues of the canal and proceeded to the execution of the work.

That is the history of it.

Mr. HOWE. Who made that mortgage?

Mr. SHERMAN. This same canal company, with the authority of Congress and the authority of the Legislature of Kentucky, both concurring. At that time Congress refused or at least declined or neglected to take possession of the canal, and the repairs were allowed to go on under charge of the Engineer Department, but under the authority of this trusteeship, and the work was completed just before the passage of the act of 1872. The work of the United States being completed and all the debts extinguished except this bonded liability of $1,110,000, then the State of Kentucky passed a joint resolution in 1872 which recited that the Government owning all this property, the trustees should be directed to transfer the legal title over to the United States upon certain terms and conditions, all of which have been agreed to by the Congress of the United States except the last, which for the reason I have stated we could not agree to.

Mr. HOWE. That legal title was an equity of redemption?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, an equity of redemption. It was the property subject to the mortgage. That is what we take possession of under this bill, and all we propose to take possession of.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask the Senator from Ohio, if he can tell me, what has become of the large profits derived from this canal? I notice that it has been asserted that they have been exacting very large tolls. What has become of those large tolls? Have they all been divided among these five stockholders?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; they have been applied to the purchase of the stock. The Government of the United States did not appropriate money to buy in the stock, but the revenues of the canal have been applied to purchasing in the stock of other stockholders.

Mr. MORTON. And a large portion of it to the construction of the enlargement of the canal.

Mr. SHERMAN. And a portion of it for the salaries of these trustees.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. As the company was first chartered by the State of Kentucky and those conditions were inserted in the laws of 1842 and 1844, what is there to prevent the Legislature of Kentucky from subsequently altering or changing the terms prescribed by the acts of 1842 and 1844?

Mr. SHERMAN. They cannot do it because those laws are a compact with the United States, under which the United States have invested $5,000,000, and the State of Kentucky cannot pass any law impairing a contract with the United States, nor do they propose to do it. The State of Kentucky, so far as I can see, has acted in perfect good faith in this whole matter.

Mr. MORTON. How long has the enlargement of the canal been going on?

Mr. SHERMAN. It commenced during the war. I think it took about six years. It has just been completed now.

Mr. MORTON. The United States have been appropriating, I think for nearly ten years, in the way of enlargement of that canal on the faith of this very contract, and the property has been constantly recognized as being in the United States. Now, the question of the right of Kentucky to tax the property does not affect the question of possession. It is now proposed to give to the United States the actual possession of this property, and take it out of the hands of the trustees, and that is all there is in this bill. Whether the taxes spoken of were valid or not, is not now the question. The question is, is the Government entitled upon the payment of the remaining five shares to take absolute possession of this property? And for that we have a positive contract with the State of Kentucky more than thirty years ago.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to inquire when and where the trustees have rendered an account of their management of this property?

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill requires them to render an account. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to institute the proper proceedings.

Mr. HOWE. No such account has ever been rendered?

Mr. SHERMAN. So far as I know, they have not rendered an account. If they have, it has been to the State of Kentucky.

Mr. MORTON. They have rendered an account practically to the engineer of the United States in charge, General Weitzel, and have done so for several years.

Mr. HOWE. Has it ever been put in print?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir; I think there is a document here now that refers to the account. I think they have settled with him or have accounted to him practically.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand a mortgage was given to secure those bonds. About what time was that mortgage given?

Mr. MORTON. I do not remember.

Mr. SHERMAN. The mortgage was given in 1857. Some of the bonds, I think, are thirty-year bonds and do not expire until 1886.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This public work did not belong to the United States then in 1857?

Mr. SHERMAN. It was still held in the name of the trustees; but both the United States, which then owned the beneficial interest, and the State of Kentucky, which held the jurisdiction, concurrred in authorizing this company to borrow money and issue bonds, and continue the work in the name of the trustees.

Mr. THURMAN. The Government of the United States at the time that mortgage was authorized and issued owned all the stock of this company but five shares.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. So I understand; but they did not own this work, or else they only could have given a mortgage.

Mr. SHERMAN. The United States did not own it at all. The whole matter has been in the hands of these trustees.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. So I understand; but there comes the question, does it not, at that point, as to the right of taxation? If the United States did not own the canal at all, there may be considerable question whether the State of Kentucky might not tax this property?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think when the United States take possession of it under a State law of Kentucky, which gives them jurisdiction when they comply with certain conditions, they have the absolute ownership free from all taxes, because they have exclusive jurisdiction subject only to certain police regulations.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, under the Kentucky act of 1842 the Government became the equitable owner of the canal, all except $500. By the same act it had a right to become the legal owner by paying that $500, and now we have passed an act authorizing the payment of that $500 and the taking possession of the canal in pursuance thereof. There is the whole question. But subsequent to that time, two years ago, the Legislature of Kentucky came in and imposed new conditions which it had no right in the world to impose, and there is all the difficulty there is about the matter.

Now I want to state to the Senate the practical difficulty arising here, the oppression upon the commerce of the country. These five trustees, who are mere shadows, who are not trustees or owners in substance at all, have imposed heavy tolls upon the commerce passing through that canal and oppressed the commerce of the river in the way I shall show you now by a letter from the president of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati. I desire the attention of the Senate to this letter. It is dated March 19, 1874, and is addressed to General BANNING, member of the House, and is as follows:

CINCINNATI, March 19, 1874.

DEAR SIR: As I promised you, I respectfully present the following memoranda in relation to the Louisville and Portland Canal:

The steamer Thompson Dean left Cincinnati on Sunday, March 8, 1874, for New Orleans. With other cargo, she took barrel pork at thirty-four cents per barrel, in round numbers at two dollars per ton. It cost her one dollar per ton to pass through the Louisville and Portland Canal, going from Cincinnati to New Orleans, and returning boats are charged by their tonnage, without regard to the cargo they may have on board. They pay the full toll, though they may not have a ton of cargo on board.

Coal can be transported from Pittsburgh to New Orleans at about one dollar per ton; canal tolls on a steamboat going and returning are equal to the entire cost of taking coal from Pittsburgh to New Orleans in barges.

Steamboats can easily make the voyage from Cincinnati to Saint Louis, or to Memphis and return, in two weeks. A boat measuring six hundred tons and making such trips, if she always passed through the canal, would pay $300 per week canal tolls.

It is very safe to say that a packet plying regularly between Cincinnati and Saint Louis, or between Cincinnati and Memphis, would during her life time pay as much money for tolls as it cost to build and furnish the boat.

A packet line between Cincinnati and Saint Louis was recently projected. The advantage of such a line to the valleys along all the western rivers would be of very great value. Since my arrival here I have heard that the project has been abandoned, because the tolls at the canal would exhaust all the profits expected to be derived from the establishment of the lines.

There are about three hundred thousand tons of iron ore to be transported from the banks of the Mississippi below Saint Louis to the coal-fields of the Upper Ohio during the current year. As the water on the Falls of the Ohio is less for ascending than descending boats almost the entire year, a large proportion of this iron will have to pass through the canal, thus adding fifty cents to its cost of transportation.

Facts like these could be furnished you from almost every department of trade.

Yours truly,

S. F. COVINGTON.

General BANNING.

These five shadows, having no substance beyond the $500, control this question of tolls and oppress the commerce of that river. It is proposed now, in pursuance of the original contract, to pay them their $500 and take possession of the canal. The Legislature of Kentucky now has imposed new conditions, and the effect of the amendment adopted by the House of Representatives is to put off the taking possession of the canal for two years, because the Legislature of Kentucky will not meet for two years in due course under the constitution of that State, and during those two years the possession of the canal will still remain with these five directors.

I trust, sir, that the bill will not be referred, but that the Senate will non-concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives and ask for a committee of conference, for I think the whole matter can be very readily disposed of on a proper understanding of the facts.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have a general knowledge of the subject of this canal, having been called upon very many times in my life to vote appropriations for its construction. I must say, however, that of the specific appropriations and the precise terms and conditions of law which are applicable to it, I am not now as well informed as I was at the time when the various acts were passed, both in Congress and by the Legislature of Kentucky. I therefore should like a little more specific information than I have on the various points about which Senators so much disagree here to-day.

I must say, sir, that this is the most remarkable debate that I have ever listened to in this body in all my life; and I hazard the opinion that you can search the records of this body from the day the Government was formed to this hour, and you can find no parallel to that which we have witnessed here; and if we are to follow it, I think the Senate had better be abolished; certainly, its committees had better be abolished, and the Senate say, "We will take the action of the House upon grave matters involving questions of law, involving the expenditure of large sums of money, and base our action upon it without an investigation save that which occurs here upon an incidental and running debate," as has taken place here now.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a Senate bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. I know it is a Senate bill, and I know it was reported and passed and went to the House, and the House have amended it in a material manner.

Mr. THURMAN. To which we propose to disagree and have a committee of conference.

Mr. HAMLIN. To which you propose to disagree and send it to a committee of conference, which is the most objectionable way of closing legislation. It should never be done in any case where there is a full opportunity of discussing and considering the disagreeing votes of the two branches. I know that in the last days of a session, when it is utterly impossible to discuss the various amendments, we often take up an appropriation bill and disagree to the amendments of the other House in gross, and I think it is sometimes done without even reading the amendments.

Mr. CHANDLER. With the permission of the Senator from Maine, I desire to say that I care nothing as to the bill going to the Committee on Commerce. I would just as soon that it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary; but it should be referred to some committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill originated with the Committee on Finance, because the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, containing the papers, was referred to that committee. The Secretary of the Treasury submitted to the Senate the difficulty he had in purchasing these bonds, and his letter, together with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and we prepared the bill with great care.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no doubt the Finance Committee prepared the bill with great care; but notwithstanding that it did prepare it with great care, is was not the committee from which it ought to have emanated; it was a committee which had no just connection with the subject according to the usages of the Senate and the appropriateness of the various committees which we have appointed for special purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, the whole question in this controversy is not a question of commerce, is not a question of building the canal, or doing anything connected with commerce, but simply a question of the mode and manner of paying these bonds. Under the law, an appropriation has already been made to pay these identical bonds.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand that; but I think it is a question which involves the commerce of ten States, and I think the Senator from Indiana said to the amount of $1,000,000,000. If that is not a question of commerce, or a question affecting commerce in a very marked degree, I do not know what is. All questions that relate to commerce, that affect commerce, that have an appropriate connection with commerce, ought to go to the Committee on Commerce.

But I do not care whether this bill goes back to the Committee on Finance, or whether it goes to the Committee on Transportation, or whether it goes to the Committee on Commerce. I say that in the disagreement which has arisen here between the best lawyers in the Senate, between the keenest minds we have in the Senate, the one affirming the law to be this way, and the other affirming the law to be that way, it ought to go to our own committee for consideration and report that we may know and act wisely and understandingly upon what we do. I do not know that I shall not vote for the bill precisely as it passed the Senate; I do not know but that I shall vote for the amendment that was put upon it by the House; but I do think that instead of taking up the debates of the other House here, and reading them page after page, and showing that we are relying upon that body for the basis of our action, we ought to have the report of our own committee to tell us what is the law and what are the facts. I only say this, that I want to do that which shall best promote the commerce of the West. I want to put this matter upon a basis that when it shall have been accomplished it will best promote that great commerce.

Now let me suppose—and I believe it is a question that is yet undecided—that the State of Kentucky shall seek to tax these works after the Government shall have taken them completely within its own control; what is the result? I believe Kentucky is a State that will do everything that she ought properly to do. If she ought to cede jurisdiction, I believe she will do it, or will cede that power to the General Government which will enable the General Government to keep the works unobstructed and free. But suppose the other thing, that it be not so; what then? If Kentucky seeks to tax, and has under the Constitution the right to tax the property, we must impose tolls upon the business of the canal to pay those taxes. I hold that it is in the interest of every man who has a dollar of the commerce that floats upon that river, and in the interest of the very Senators who are asking us to pass this bill without knowing whether it is rightly guarded or not, that we so have it that this canal shall be at all times what they want, to wit, a free canal. Suppose, again, Kentucky will not agree to it, and that we are to be subject to this annoyance, and you stand here in that condition. I can only say what I would do; I would vote to obliterate the work and let the waters run to waste before I would vote again for the large sums that I have always cheerfully voted for these works, if any State were to come in and ask to tax the property of the Government designed to benefit its own commerce.

I look at this matter carefully in all its lights. I want to vote wisely. How can I? Shall I take the version of the law as given by the Senator from Indiana? He thinks the Senate bill is clearly right. I know that is his opinion. Shall I take the view of the law suggested by the Senator from New York? I can hardly say that I have got a very clear, well-defined opinion just now as to which of them is right, and I do not choose to be forced to decide that question upon a mere temporary debate that has sprung up here.

Sir, we owe it to the character of this body to refer this matter to a committee, and let us have a report that shall give us all the facts and all the law.

Mr. STOCKTON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. THURMAN. No, no.

Mr. MCCREERY. I should like to say something on this question, but I will not interfere with the Senator's motion.

Mr. THURMAN. Let us vote on this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) Does the Senator from New Jersey withdraw his motion?

Mr. STOCKTON. No, sir. It is proper for me to say that I am not making this motion entirely on my own account, or I would not insist upon it. I am making it on the part of a large number of gentlemen in the Senate who have an engagement at four o'clock; and as it is very near that time, they have asked me to make the motion now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at three o'clock and thirty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 3, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PONTON RAILWAY-BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. SAWYER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to ask consent to report now and put upon its passage the bill (H. R. No. 2538) to legalize and establish a ponton railway-bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien.

The bill was read. It provides that the railway ponton-bridge across the Mississippi River and an island therein, communicating with the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway at Prairie du Chien, in the State of Wisconsin, and the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway at North McGregor, in the State of Iowa, be legalized and declared a lawful structure. John Lawler and the Prairie du Chien and McGregor Railway Company, their successors and assigns, are to keep up and maintain a suitable ponton-draw of not less than two hundred and fifty feet in length in the eastern channel, and one of not less than three hundred and twenty feet in length in the principal or western channel of the river. The draw is to be opened promptly, upon reasonable signal, for the passage of boats or rafts; but in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in opening the draws before or after the passage of trains; and the said parties shall maintain, at their own expense, from sunset to sunrise, throughout the year, such lights on the bridge as may be required by the Light-House Board for the security of navigation.

The second section provides that all railway companies desiring to use said ponton-bridge shall have equal rights and privileges in the passage of the same, and in the use of the machinery and fixtures thereof, and of all approaches thereto, under and upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War upon hearing the allegations and proofs of the parties in case they shall not agree; and the United States shall have the right of way for postal telegraph purposes across said bridge. No higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said bridge. In case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the navigation of the river, created by the construction of said bridge under this act, the cause or question arising may be tried before the district court of the United States of any State in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

The third section reserves the right to alter or amend this act, so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of said river, without any liability of the Government for damages on account of the alteration or amendment of this act, or on account of the prevention or requiring the removal of any such obstructions; and if any change be made in the plan of construction of said ponton-bridge, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War; and any change in the construction, or any alteration of said bridge, that my be directed at any time by Congress or the Secretary of War, shall be made at the cost and expense of the owners thereof.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I would like to ask my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] one question. If I understand correctly the draw of this bridge is three hundred feet.

Mr. SAWYER. Three hundred and twenty.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Is it a pivot-draw?

Mr. SAWYER. No, sir; the draw is really four hundred feet; it leaves a clear pathway of three hundred and twenty feet. The committee has taken great pains to protect the interests of navigation in this matter.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman to say that this is the report of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SAWYER. Yes, sir; the unanimous report.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OBSTRUCTIONS AT HELL GATE.

Mr. CREAMER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be requested to investigate and report to this House the present condition of the work at Hell Gate, in the State of New York, and what legislation, if any, is necessary for the speedy completion of said work.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. WELLS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds a bill (H. R. No. 2787) to provide for the sale of the present United States marine hospital and site, and the purchase of a new site and the erection thereon of a new hospital, in the city of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider, IMPROVEMENT OF WOLF RIVER, WISCONSIN.

Mr. AVERILL. By direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs I ask unanimous consent to report for passage now a bill giving the assent of Congress for the improvement of the Wolf River across the Menomonee Indian reservation, in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] objects, and demands the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to introduce a resolution to get some papers; it will take but a moment.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not withdraw the demand; therefore the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts need not be read.

ALASKA FUR TRADE.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the bill which comes over as unfinished business from yesterday morning, the bill (H. R. No. 2667) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to gather authentic information as to the condition and importance of the fur trade in the Territory of Alaska. The pending question is on the amendment offered yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN.]

Mr. CONGER. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof Mr. COBURN'S amendment was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word on this bill before it is passed.

Mr. CONGER. I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish to say a few words on this bill, by consent of the House. Has the previous question been called on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The previous question was called on the engrossment and third reading of the bill. The question now is, Shall the bill pass? If the gentleman from Michigan declines to yield, he must then demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I do so.

The House divided; and there were ayes—54, noes 25; no quorum voting.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not wish to make any personal reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman merely wishes to explain his position, I have no objection.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish merely to explain some reasons which influenced me yesterday in the course I took.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Is this in order?

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass? Of course, if the previous question is not seconded it is open for debate. The gentleman from Michigan, who has charge of the bill, has called the previous question; but no quorum voting, it was thought better to allow the gentleman from Vermont to proceed with his statement. The Chair thinks it would be the better course, and save time of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. And the Chair is right.

Mr. CONGER. I should myself have no objection to the gentleman from Vermont going on. But this has occupied some time already, and gentlemen around me insist we shall go on with the vote.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted, the Chair will order tellers; and appoints Mr. CONGER and Mr. HOLMAN.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the previous question is not sustained will not this bill go over?

Mr. CONGER. I understand no further count is asked.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; I demand further count.

I wish to ask, Mr. Speaker, whether, this being private-bill day, if the previous question is not seconded this bill does not go over?

The SPEAKER. It came over as unfinished business.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the previous question is not seconded does it not go over to-day?

The SPEAKER. It does. Does the gentleman demand further count?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 126, noes 28.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 97, noes 24; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on a quorum. I am opposed to the creation of any new office without a quorum of the House being present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint the same tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 121, noes 27.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he answered the gentleman from Indiana erroneously on the point of order. He did not at the time bear in mind that this bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce under the leave granted by the House to report at any time; and the rule expressly says that the right to report at any time implies the right to consider at any time. The bill was in a different condition from a bill ordinarily coming by regular report before the House.

MRS. JAMES K. POLK.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the southern claims commission do send to the Speaker of the House the papers and proofs in the case of Mrs. James K. Polk, widow of the late President of the United States.

Mr. LAWRENCE. There is no southern claims commission; that is a misnomer.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope there will be no objection. There is something in the way of respect due to the widow of an ex-President of the United States.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is the claim allowed or disallowed?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Neither; it has not been considered.

Mr. LAWRENCE. What is the object of the resolution?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is to bring the case here and refer it to your committee.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is it not within the jurisdiction of the commissioners of claims? If it is not, then I do not object. The designation in the bill should be commissioners of claims, and not southern claims commission.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I make that correction.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP SUBSIDY.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the preamble and resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the following preamble and resolution were adopted by the Forty-second Congress, to wit:

"Whereas in the testimony taken before the Ways and Means Committee of this House, in reference to certain matters committed to said committee for investigation, it was sworn by Lagrande Lockwood, of New York City, that a large sum of money was used to secure the passage through Congress of an increased appropriation to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, in the nature of a subsidy for the transportation of mails, and for other purposes: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That said Committee on Ways and Means are hereby authorized and directed to make full inquiry into the truth or falsity of said sworn statement, and to this end the said committee is hereby authorized and directed to send for persons and papers, and generally to exercise such powers and discretion as will be necessary thereto;"

And whereas subsequently thereto said Forty-second Congress did further resolve as follows, to wit:

"Resolved, That the testimony taken by the Committee on Ways and Means under the order of the House in regard to the alleged use of money to procure the passage of the subsidy for the Pacific Mail Steamship Company be deposited with the Clerk of the House, to be laid by him before the next Congress for its consideration:"

Therefore,

Be it further resolved, That the present Ways and Means Committee be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to proceed at once to the full and complete investigation of the truth or falsity of said sworn statements, and make report to this House at as early a day of this session as practicable; and said committee is hereby reinvested with all the power and authority conferred by the first resolution above.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to hear the first portion of the preamble again read.

The first portion of the preamble was again read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to the present consideration of the resolution, but not to its reference to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. RANDALL. Who objects?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. RANDALL. Then I move to lay aside the preamble and pass the resolution. Let us see if any one objects to the resolution.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to inquire if the resolution does not direct the Committee on Ways and Means to lay aside for this purpose other business on which they are now engaged?

Mr. RANDALL. It does not. It directs the committee to report to this House at as early a day as practicable.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then I do not object.

Mr. DAWES. I do not object to the resolution; but I wish to state to the House that the investigation before the committee of the last Congress was placed by the committee in the hands of those gentlemen upon the committee who moved the investigation. They were instructed by the committee and clothed with power by the House to proceed in that investigation just as far as they pleased; and although it was committed to the committee in the late hours of the session, yet they proceeded as far as they chose, and reported back themselves to the committee that they did not desire to proceed any further. The testimony that was taken by them was reported back to the House as is recited there, and, under seal, recommitted to the committee this session. The committee have been disposed the moment they could get through with the business that is pressing upon them to open that testimony, and if in their opinion it required them to proceed further, they were ready to proceed.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. DAWES. This statement is due to the last committee as well as to the present committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no doubt that the Committee on Ways and Means are quite ready to proceed to the investigation of corruption and expose it; but this is a general reminder to them.

Mr. DAWES. I think the resolution should be referred to the committee.

The SPEAKER. It is not before the House unless it is referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. There has been debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] objected immediately and suggested that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DAWES. I trust it will be so referred.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have no objection to its being referred.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to take the committee out of the position which the chairman has described. I want them to be instructed or advised by the House.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

There was no objection, and the resolution was so referred.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I demand the regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded; and this being Friday, the committees will be called for reports of a private nature. The call rests with the Committee on Military Affairs. The morning hour begins at twenty-five minutes before one o'clock.

N. J. BARDIN.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back adversely the petition of N. J. Bardin, widow of J. T. Bardin, late a private of Company M, Eighth Tennessee Volunteers, asking a pension; which was laid on the table.

OLIVER LUMPHREY.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2067) to restore Oliver Lumphrey, late a second lieutenant Forty-ninth United States Infantry Veteran Reserve Corps, to his former rank in the Army of the United States; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RANK AND STATUS OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 590) relative to the rank and status of certain officers in the United States Army; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

KERRY SULLIVAN.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 491) for the relief of Kerry Sullivan, of Company G, Fourteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

H. P. INGRAM AND JOHN K. ASKINS.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2788) for the relief of H. P. Ingram and John K. Askins, of the Sixty-second Illinois Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state for the benefit of all members having private bills to report which are to go on the Private Calendar, that they should always be accompanied by written reports; for it is in order to have the report read when debate is not in order on objection days.

Mr. RANDALL. Is not this objection day?

The SPEAKER. It is. All reports accompanying bills are ordered to be printed, and adverse reports are always printed.

JOHN S. DICKSON.

Mr. COBURN, from the same committee, reported back, with amendments, and with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2789) for the relief of John S. Dickson, late captain of paroled prisoners; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. THORNBURGH, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the petition of P. G. Hopkins, for relief, and the same was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. DONNAN, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the petition of surviving officers, soldiers, and marines of the war against Mexico, residing in the State of Oregon and the Territory of Washington, asking for recognition of their services, and the same was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

JAMES H. DAVIDSON.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1327) for the relief of James H. Davidson, late colonel of the One hundred and twenty-second United States Colored Troops; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

DONATION OF CANNON.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2363) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver condemned ordnance to Post No. 36 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Trumansburgh, New York; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

MILITARY TELEGRAPH OPERATORS.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 840) to include military telegraph operators within the provisions of the act approved April 4, 1872, to enable honorably discharged soldiers, &c., to acquire homesteads on the public lands; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

GEORGE S. GUSTIN.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1322) for the relief of George S. Gustin, late private Company D, Seventy-fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Judiciary Committee to report as a substitute for a bill referred to them a bill to enable the Central Branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company to submit its claims against the United States under existing law to the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. SPEER. Is that a private bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not a private bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is only to pay a corporation a claim.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that all bills touching land grants to railroads have always been held to be public bills. The bill will have to come in on the regular call of the committee.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. PACKARD, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of July, 1854, three reports of the surveyor-general of the Territory of New Mexico on private land claims in said Territory; which was recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

LAND-ENTRIES IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BUCKNER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1848) to confirm certain entries of lands therein named in the State of Missouri; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN JOHN C. BEAUMONT.

Mr. SCOFIELD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1063) to restore Captain John C. Beaumont, of the United States Navy, to his original position on the Navy Register.

The bill was read. It authorizes the President of the United States to restore Captain John C. Beaumont, of the United States Navy, now on the active list, to his original position on the Navy Register next above Captain Charles H. B. Caldwell.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EDWARD O'MEAGHER CONDON.

Mr. BANNING, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 81) in relation to Edward O'Meagher Condon; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution requests the President of the United States to intercede with Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland for the purpose of securing the speedy release of Edward O'Meagher Condon, of Cincinnati, Ohio, who was convicted on a charge of murder in Manchester, England, and is now confined in prison.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not care for the reading of the report, but I ask that it be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to that.

The report was as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the following petition of Governor Edward F. Noyes, Right Rev. J. B. Purcell, archbishop of Cincinnati, and other citizens of Ohio, with the letters, statements, and testimonials accompanying—

STATEMENT.

The case of Edward O'Meagher Condon, now confined in Portland convict prison, England, convicted for complicity in the killing of a policeman in Manchester.

Edward O'Meagher Condon, a citizen of the United States, late a resident of Cincinnati, Ohio, was sent over to Ireland from Cincinnati in the spring of 1867 to attend to some property left to his father by an uncle. He was instructed to call at Manchester on his return to see two relatives residing there. While in Manchester he was arrested for complicity in the killing of the aforesaid policeman, under the following circumstances:

Two suspected Fenians, named Kelley and Deacy, were being sent to jail in a prison van with other prisoners. The van was stopped about half-way between the court-house and jail by a party of forty men, who demanded the release of the two suspected Fenians. They ordered the policeman inside the van to open the doors. He had the keys, but refused to comply. The party then proceeded to break open the van with stones, &c., but failing, one of them fired a pistol into the key-hole to burst the lock. The bullet accomplished the object, and shot the policeman inside. There was no intention to injure the man. It might as well be one of the prisoners who would get hurt; but he was in the course of the bullet, and got killed.

Condon was arrested the same evening three miles away from the place of the accident. The affair created the wildest excitement and great alarm throughout England, particularly in Manchester; and in the midst of this popular panic a special commission was appointed to convict the prisoners. They were tried in batches of five, and Condon, an American, was included in the first batch. They were all convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to be hanged. Tweny-five witnesses swore against one man, fifteen against two more, ten against the fourth, and five against Condon. The person who had ten witnesses against him was liberated on the application of the reporters, who declared that he did not have a fair trial. Five of the witnesses who had him convicted were those who swore against Condon. Three of those witnesses were prostitutes, confined in the van at the time of the riot, one a detective, and a fifth a by-stander.

The evidence of this last witness was that he recognized Condon by seeing him hit by a stone, which cut his head, and he knew him by the wound. The policeman who arrested Condon swore that he inflicted the wound on Condon's head at the time of the arrest, and a surgeon swore that the wound was not inflicted by a stone.

In the preliminary investigation not one of the witnesses identified Condon as present at the breaking of the van until the detective, who afterward swore against him, took the three prostitutes and pointed Condon out to them through a window. After this they swore that he was one of the rioters. Yet upon such evident perjury he was convicted.

Immediately after his conviction he wrote to Mr. Low, American consul at Manchester, who directed him to write a statement of his case to him, and he would send it to Minister Adams, who immediately applied for and got a respite by directions sent by telegraph by Mr. Seward.

From the statement of Daniel Redden, just published, who was confined for the same cause, it is greatly feared that Condon cannot long survive such terrible cruelty. He is accused of murdering a man he never saw. A petition signed by all the members of the city council of Cincinnati and indorsed by President Grant had no effect. A kind letter from Chief Justice Chase, in which he said, "As three had been put to death for the murder of one, surely justice ought to be satisfied and mercy take place in Condon's case," also failed. The chivalrous General Sherman requested his release as a special favor to himself for the many times he was instrumental in getting Englishmen out of trouble in this country. Home Secretary Bruce has all those letters, together with one from Judge Fitzgerald, of Dublin, in which he told the home secretary that, after an examination of Condon's trial, he would not convict him on such evidence.

The case of Condon is peculiar. Ten witnesses convicted the man who was set free, and only five of the same witnesses appeared against him, yet he is still in prison.

To the Congress of the United States:

Your petitioners, residents of the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, respectfully, but earnestly, ask that you will, by proper resolution or otherwise, interpose in behalf of Edward O'Meagher Condon, a citizen of this State and city, now in confinement in the Portland convict establishment, in England, for the alleged murder of a policeman in Manchester.

Your petitioners state that young Condon was, in 1867, a resident of this city, and was a good, industrious, and honest young man, respected by all who knew him; that in that year he was sent over to Ireland from Cincinnati to attend to some property left his father, Thomas Condon, of this city, and was also instructed on his return to call on two relatives living in Manchester, England; that while near said Manchester he was arrested for alleged complicity in the murder of a policeman of Manchester; that he was hurriedly tried, and, as we fully believe, by false testimony of perjured witnesses, condemned to death; that thereafter, upon representations made by Mr. Adams, the American minister to the British government, his sentence was commuted, or a reprieve granted; that he has since then, now more than five years, been imprisoned in England, and still lies there in jail; and we state that he had ever been, while in the United States, a young man of exemplary character.

That his long confinement has worn upon his health, and must ultimately, added to the keen sense of the injustice of his condemnation, kill him, unless he is released. That he was the main hope and stay of his parents, Thomas Condon and wife, who are old, and that his sad condition has brought untold sorrow and distress upon his family. That his release is demanded by justice and mercy both. That his trial was hasty and imperfect, and he was made a victim to falsehood and excitement.

That we have no doubt if the British government would authorize a new trial in his case it would be clearly shown that he is innocent of the great crime imputed to him. And we, his parents, neighbors, and friends, earnestly ask your honorable bodies to take such action as will be consistent with your honor and that of our country, and also as will afford the English government the opportunity to show to American citizens that justice which no government is more constant and energetic in demanding for her own subjects than she is.

THOMAS CONDON,
His father.
ELLEN CONDON,
His mother.

I recommend and request that a new trial be granted if possible.

I cheerfully concur in the request of Governor E. F. Noyes.

S. S. DAVIS, Mayor.

I am not acquainted with the facts of the case or the laws under which Condon was tried, but Mr. and Mrs. Condon are worthy people, their son is their stay, and his release would be a mercy and a blessing to them.

7 MERRION SQUARE, EAST DUBLIN,
February 14, 1874.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 22d, and in reply take leave to assure you that I did not write to Mr. Secretary Bruce. I did not receive from him the reply which you describe. My position as a judge prohibits me from interfering in any case not tried before me, and even then only when called on by Government for a report. Mr. Kenslin Digby, member of Parliament for the Queen's County, is a connection of mine, and a valued friend, whose opinion I very much respect. He was deeply interested in your son's case, and he has frequently conversed with me about him and his trial. I learned from Mr. Digby that he has studied the case carefully, and had come to the conclusion that your son, Edward O'Meagher Condon, or Shore, had taken no part in the homicide of the constable of Manchester, and was implicated by taking part in the riot, and by stone-throwing only; that he was unarmed, and that there was no proof against him of any previous design. I had no knowledge whatever of the case myself. Mr. Digby felt very much for one so young and prepossessing as your son, but felt more for you and the family. I am aware of the great exertion he has made to procure your son's release, and I would have aided him if I had the power to do so.

I have no doubt that Mr. Digby will not be deterred by previous failures from continuing his efforts, and I most sincerely hope that zeal and efforts may soon prove successful,

I can only express my feelings for you and your afflictions, and remain your faithful,

J. D. FITZGERALD.

Mr. THOMAS CONDON.

CINCINNATI, January 28, 1874.

SIR: When in England I took special pains to get the facts in relation to the case of Condon, alias Shore, convicted of murder in Manchester, with three others. The others were executed. On account of well-grounded doubts of the participation of Shore in the murder, his sentence was commuted. Mr. Moran, our secretary of legation at the court of Saint James, was very much interested in the case, and after a thorough investigation, came to the conclusion that Shore, alias Condon, was entirely innocent. I conversed with Jacob Bright, M. P., Mr. Potter, Sir Wilford Lawson, and other members of Parliament, who expressed much interest in behalf of the accused. Young Condon is a worthy son of most worthy parents in your district, and every effort possible should be made to secure his liberty from confinement and his return to his family.

Mr. Moran can furnish all the facts in the case if written to.

I send you copy of petition, &c., and a letter from one of the most eminent judges of Ireland, to the father. The latter you will please preserve.

Yours, &c.,

S. F. CARY.

Hon. H. B. BANNING, M. C.

Have had the same under advisement, and after careful investigation of the cause and facts connected with the conviction of Edward O'Meagher Condon, make the following report to the House of Representatives:

Edward O'Meagher Condon is of Irish parentage; a citizen of Cincinnati, Ohio, of respectable family and associations, and has always borne a good character.

In the year 1867 he was on a visit to some of his relatives in Manchester, England. While there he became involved in a mob which had collected for the purpose of rescuing some Fenian prisoners.

From the evidence brought out in a trial subsequent to the affray, it seems that the prisoners were being conveyed in a van through the streets, the door of which was not only locked but guarded by a policeman on the inside. A shot was fired for the purpose, as asserted, of forcing the door. This shot unfortunately killed the policeman.

For this offense Condon and four others were convicted of murder, and sentenced to be hanged. Three of these were executed, one was discharged, while Condon's sentence was commuted to imprisonment for life at hard labor.

This occurred during the intense excitement of the Fenian struggle, after invasion of Canada from the United States, and the battle of Ridgway.

It would be seen, therefore, that a trial under the circumstances might be influenced by the feeling pervading the community where the offense occurred.

This would be intensified, of course, by the fact that one of the defendants was an American citizen, and held responsible as a prime mover in the original trouble.

Without questioning the justice of the verdict, we are of the opinion that executive clemency could go further than in a mere commutation of the sentence to hard labor for life.

It is not claimed that the unfortunate Condon fired the shot which resulted so fatally, and the very cause that led to the swift punishment pleads with irresistible force in his favor.

In the excitement of the moment he possibly encouraged the violence meant to break a lock, which resulted in a death without having the malice prepense necessary to make it murder. On this ground his sentence was commuted, as we have stated, and on this ground we claim he might well be pardoned.

We are well aware of the fact that Condon's offense was aggravated in the eye of the law by his being an American citizen. At the same time we ought to remember that Condon's Irish descent and Irish connections prompted the feeling that caused him to interfere, and under all circumstances we believe the Government of the United States would be justified, if, indeed, it is not a duty, to use every legitimate influence to procure his release. In this we are strengthened by the influential character of our American citizens praying for such release, to say nothing of the letter in Condon's behalf, written by Judge Fitzgerald, of Ireland, and a report of an investigation made by Hon. S. F. Cary, member of Congress, while in Manchester, immediately after this lamentable occurrence.

In view, therefore, of the prevailing interest felt in the prisoner's behalf throughout the country, and in behalf of his innocence of the offense with which he is charged, or, if guilty of an indiscretion in his acts, that he has already endured sufficient punishment, your committee deem it proper that action should be had by Congress tending to secure intercession on the part of the President for his release, and hence report the accompanying joint resolution, and respectfully ask its passage.

Mr. BANNING. I ask that the joint resolution be passed.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS FOR SEMINOLE WAR OF 1818.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania. I am instructed by the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812 to report a bill granting pensions to soldiers and widows of soldiers of the Seminole war of 1818.

Mr. RANDALL. Is not that a public bill?

The SPEAKER. All bills affecting a class of pensioners are public bills. The bill will be read; after which objection will be asked to its being reported to-day.

Mr. RANDALL. In order to save time I will object now.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be returned to the committee.

REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, without amendment, the following Senate bills; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the reports accompanying the same ordered to be printed:

A bill (S. No. 518) granting a pension to Benjamin C. Skinner;

A bill (S. No. 449) granting a pension to Mrs. Amy A. Hough;

A bill (S. No. 217) granting a pension to Julia A. Smith; and

A bill (S. No. 387) granting a pension to Captain Benjamin Farley, of Company C, Fifth Indiana Cavalry.

Mr. WALLACE, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, the following bill; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar:

A bill (S. No. 42) granting a pension to Caleb A. Lamb, late a musician in Company E, Forty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers.

Mr. BARRY, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2790) granting a pension to Nancy Abbott; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. MCJUNKIN, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2791) granting a pension to Franklin Stoner; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, the following bills; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1616) granting a pension to John G. Parr, of Kittaning, Pennsylvania; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2118) for the relief of Elizabeth Clarke.

Mr. MARTIN, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, a bill (S. No. 316) granting a pension to Elizabeth F. Thompson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2792) granting a pension to Llewellyn Bell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the report accompanying the same, ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. 2793) to correct the time for commencing to draw a pension.

Mr. RANDALL. That is a general bill, I believe.

Mr. SPEER. Let it go to the Committee of the Whole; do not raise the point upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. I insist upon my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken; the bill will be returned to the committee.

Mr. MARTIN. It is not a public bill.

The SPEAKER. Anything which makes regulations in regard to a class of pensions or a class of pensioners on the rolls is a public bill.

Mr. MARTIN. It does not regulate a class of pensions, but is simply to correct the date of commencement of a pension for one person.

The SPEAKER. That is a private bill; but the Chair will suggest that it is generally better to have the name of the individual incorporated in the title; that will leave no doubt, and it makes a much better reference in the index.

The bill (H. R. No. 2792) was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, the following bills; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the reports accompanying the same ordered to be printed:

A bill (S. No. 361) granting a pension to Sciotha Brashears, late of the Seventeenth Regiment Kentucky Cavalry; and

A bill (H. R. No. 599) for the relief of Ade H. McDonald, of Nashville, Tennessee.

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky, also, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the following bill; which was laid upon the table:

A bill (H. R. No. 1713) for the relief of Bigsby E. Dodson, of Nashville, Tennessee.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, the following bill; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar:

A bill (S. No. 566) granting a pension to Lucinda Schrum, widow of of Jacob R. Schrum, late of Company A, Forty-ninth Regiment Missouri Volunteers.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report back without amendment, and ask its immediate consideration, House bill No. 2716, granting a pension to Mrs. Mary C. Reno.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections will be in order to its present consideration.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Mary C. Reno, widow of Jesse L. Reno, late major-general in the United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of fifty dollars a month from and after the passage of this act.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'BRIEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. No. 548) granting a pension to Christiana Bailey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2794) granting a pension to Elizabeth Wolf, widow of John F. Wolfe, late of Company D, Third Regiment Maryland Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

MRS. MERCY ANN HALL.

Mr. MONROE, from the Committee on Education and Labor, reported back the memorial of Mrs. Mercy Ann Hall, widow of Captain Charles F. Hall, late commander of the Polaris expedition, praying for relief, and moved that the said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. HOSKINS. The Committee on Accounts have directed me to report back the resolution which I send to the desk, without any special recommendation. If the House desires the investigation covered by the resolution to be made, the Committee on Accounts is decidedly of the opinion that these committees need a clerk. If the investigation is not to proceed, no clerk, of course, is necessary. We leave the question entirely in the hands of the House.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, and the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings have leave jointly to employ a clerk during the present session of Congress at the usual rate of compensation.

Mr. RANDALL. This resolution proposes to create a new officer who will draw money from the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that this resolution involves an expenditure of money.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is this a private bill?

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] makes the point that this is not a private bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it be crushed out between the two.

The SPEAKER. On the point of order that it is not private in its nature, the resolution will be returned to the Committee on Accounts.

RELIEF OF BUILDERS OF STEAMERS.

Mr. KELLEY, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2795) for the relief of the builders of steamers La Portena, Edward Everett, F. W. Lincoln, Azalia, and N. P. Banks; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the Committee on Claims, reported adversely upon the memorial of J. N. Carpenter, asking compensation for loss of slaves; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2796) for the relief of Raphael Madrazo; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 1207) for the relief of James W. Bowen, late provost-marshal of the tenth congressional district of Pennsylvania; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDEN, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1370) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to settle and pay the accounts of William Pelham, late surveyor-general of New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the following; which were laid on the table, and the reports ordered to be printed:

Memorial of F. A. Stone for compensation for services under the Commissioner of Public Buildings;

Claim of William E. Bond, late collector of internal revenue of the first North Carolina district;

A bill (H. R. No. 1642) for the relief of Jacob P. Clark, late register of the United States land-office at Olympia, Washington Territory; and

A bill (H. R. No. 289) for the relief of the heirs of Henry Fullenwider, deceased.

PRINTING OF ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to inquire whether the printing of an adverse report is within the discretion of the House?

The SPEAKER. There is no rule upon the subject; but it has been the uniform usage to print such reports; so as to put the opinion of the House on record.

REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2797) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of March 3, 1871; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the memorial of J. and T. Green; of Jackson, Mississippi, asking indemnity for property destroyed by the United States Army; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, from the same committee, reported back with amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 488) for the relief of B. C. Bailey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2798) for the relief of John J. Hayden; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. LAWRENCE, from the same committee, reported back papers in the case of Henry S. Zumro, moved that said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that they be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

RECONSIDERATION OF REFERENCES.

Mr. RANDALL. As to all these bills which have been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, I move that the vote referring them be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that this motion is not particularly important; for any bill of this kind, if brought back into the House upon a motion to reconsider, would be again liable to the point of order requiring its reference again to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. Still my motion is a safe one.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be considered as agreed to.

ALIENS AS ENGINEERS AND PILOTS.

Mr. CONGER (when the Committee on Commerce was called) said: The Committee on Commerce have directed me to report back, with amendments, a Senate bill which is not exactly of a private nature, but for the passage of which there is great urgency. It is a bill (S. No. 580) to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots.

The bill was read. It provides than any alien who, in the manner provided for by law, has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States may be licensed, as if already naturalized, to serve as an engineer or pilot on any steam-vessel subject to inspection under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1871.

Mr. RANDALL. That is a public bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks leave to report back a bill with an amendment, which will be read subject to objection.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 2, after "United States," insert "and who shall have been a permanent resident of the United States for at least six months immediately prior to the granting of such license."

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order that is a public bill and cannot be considered to-day.

Mr. FIELD. I object to it.

Mr. MERRIAM. So do I.

CHEROKEE INDIANS OF GEORGIA.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back adversely a joint resolution (H. R. No. 37) providing for the payment of certain per capita allowance to the Indians of the Cherokee tribe residing in the State of Georgia; which was laid on the table.

W. A. WEBSTER.

Mr. AVERILL. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report a bill for the relief of W. A. Webster, and to enlarge the reservation of the Makah Indians in Washington Territory.

Mr. SPEER. That is a public bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill contains provisions which make it a public bill.

Mr. AVERILL. I wish to say, by order of the President certain territory was taken some two years ago and annexed to this reservation. By an arrangement with the Indian Department the value of the land was appraised by referees. The real purpose of the bill is to confirm the action of the President and to compensate the owner of the property.

Mr. RANDALL. If it was not a public bill the President would not have had anything to do with it.

The SPEAKER. It is a public bill, and it will be returned to the gentleman from Minnesota to be reported on the general call of committees.

MILITARY RESERVATIONS, ARIZONA.

Mr. HUNTON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back a bill (H. R. No. 1341) authorizing the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department parts of certain reservations in the Territory of Arizona no longer required for military purposes.

Mr. SPEER. I rise to the point of order that is a public bill.

The SPEAKER. It is a public bill, and will be returned to the gentleman from Virginia, to be reported on the general call of committees.

WILLIAM ROOD.

Mr. HUNTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1220) for the relief of William Rood, late private of the Thirty-sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

DAVID W. STOCKSTILL.

Mr. HUNTON also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2799) for the relief of David W. Stockstill, of Sidney, Ohio, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

JOHN BURKE.

Mr. HUNTON also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of John Burke, late first lieutenant Company F, Seventy-third Ohio Volunteers; which was laid on the table.

BENJAMIN CRAWFORD.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2800) for the relief of Benjamin Crawford; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The SPEAKER. Before the House goes into committee the Chair begs attention to a very small personal matter of some delicacy which he desires to submit to members. He does it with some hesitation, but thinks it better than that it should be left undone.

In the arrangement of the galleries, in the reserved galleries, from a usage which dates back to the organization of the Government, a single seat, not a large one, has been placed at the disposal of the Speaker. It is not simply a family matter, but has been used for distinguished visitors who under the rules could not be admitted to the floor, and its occupancy has been of great convenience in the way of extending such courtesy. As old members will recollect, it was formerly in the diplomatic gallery, but in the new arrangement, when a gallery was reserved for members, the Door-keeper assigned the shorter one of the front seats for the use of the Speaker. Some members have expressed dissatisfaction with it, and have not been disposed to accept it. This dissatisfaction has not been expressed to the Speaker, but to the man who has charge of the gallery. Now the Speaker does not claim this seat as a right, but as a courtesy of course it is grateful, and it is worth nothing unless extended with cordiality.

While not claiming it as a right, the Chair does not wish it to be left in dispute, and as it has belonged to the Speaker by immemorial usage, the change, if there be one, should be ordered by the House. The present occupant of the chair is perhaps as little disposed to insist on matters of this kind as any of his predecessors, and gave up voluntarily and cheerfully the use of the Speaker's parlor for the general use of members, which had hitherto been in the exclusive occupancy of the Speaker. And if there be any dissatisfaction with this arrangement in regard to the seat, he very cheerfully offers to give that up. But he wishes it to be understood distinctly whether the seat is to be at his disposal, as it has always been at the disposal of his predecessors.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the custom be now made a rule, or rather that the judgment of the House be expressed in favor of the usage, because a motion to make it a rule would require to be referred.

Mr. MAYNARD. I quite concur in that view of the matter. It seems to me there ought to be some seat in the gallery, the right to the exclusive use of which should attach to the office of Speaker, not to the particular member who happens for the time to fill the Speaker's chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has spoken of it as belonging to the office, not to himself at all.

Mr. MAYNARD. There should be a seat which the Speaker could designate as Speaker. If the Representative from Maine chooses to use another seat for his own family or for strangers, that is a matter of his own. But there should be a seat attached to his office as Speaker, to be used in such a way as he should think proper in his official capacity.

The SPEAKER. It is much more frequently assigned by the present occupant of the chair to strangers than to any one else.

Mr. DAWES. I think whatever grumbling may have arisen has been from a misunderstanding on the part of the door-keepers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not bring this up with the idea that a single member of the House meant any unkindness to the Speaker; he has no idea of that kind whatever; but merely that there may be a perfect understanding about it. The relations of the present occupant of the chair with all the members of the House are personally of the kindest character.

Mr. DAWES. The statement of the Speaker as to the usage in this matter fully accords with my own recollection. I have been here ever since this Hall was occupied; and during all that time this right has been accorded by common consent to the office of Speaker. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will be acquiesced in by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I would rather leave it to the discretion of the Speaker, whoever he may be, than incorporate it in the rules. I would therefore modify my motion so as to leave it in the discretion of the Chair.

Mr. McNULTA. I agree with the gentlemen who have spoken that there might be properly a seat awarded to the office of the Speaker of this House as an act of courtesy to the officer and not to the person. But I do decidedly object to any member of this House having any exclusive privilege or seat in the gallery assigned to the use of members. The reason for so objecting I think will be apparent to every member. When our families come to the gallery and ask admittance, they must be notified, so to speak, that they are second-class passengers in that boat; that there is a seat they cannot occupy; that that seat is specially reserved. I understand that the custom has heretofore been, or that the practice has been, to assign this official seat in the diplomatic gallery, where the members' families will not come in contact with these notices, that are, to say the least, very disagreeable.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will allow a correction just here the Chair will make one. Prior to this session there never has been a seat reserved for members' families at all. The diplomatic gallery was open to the access of members' families, and the front seat in that gallery was given to the Speaker. When there was an arrangement made for the reservation of a gallery for members' families, of course the Speaker did not desire a seat away from the members, and the Door-keeper assigned him one in that gallery instead of in the diplomatic gallery.

Mr. MCNULTA. I think members will see the impropriety of keeping one seat vacant, as this will be most of the time. I think we should all meet here on a level. Every man here is entitled to the same privileges as any other man; and whatever may be especially accorded to the Speaker in his official position should be accorded to him in such a way that there should be no affront, no discrimination as against the rest of the members. While I acquiesce in the setting apart of a seat in some other gallery, I do certainly object to its being set apart in the members' gallery. I claim to have the same rights here as every other member has.

Mr. MELLISH. Would it be in order to make a motion that the gallery set apart for members' families be abolished?

The SPEAKER. Not at the present time.

Mr. MELLISH. I think the distinction between members' families and others should not be any longer continued. It is European, and ought to be abolished for the credit of the country.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will renew his motion that this subject be referred to the Committee on Rules, or I will make that motion with a view to the adoption of a proper rule on the subject. It is very clear that there has always been—at least it has been the case for the last ten or twelve years, ever since I have been here—a seat in the gallery set apart as a matter of convenience and courtesy for the use of the Speaker of the House. It is very proper that it should be done, and on the same principle that there is a room in this part of the Capitol for the use of the Speaker and under his control. I move that the subject be referred to the Committee on Rules with instructions to report a proper rule in regard to it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not see that we need encumber the rules with this matter. This is a practice which has obtained here ever since we have been in this Hall. Seats have always been reserved for the Speaker, and we have seen our wives and daughters and friends repeatedly reminded by the door-keeper that such seats were reserved. Nobody took offense at it then, and perhaps we were as careful of the feelings of our friends then as we are now. It seems to me that the simple statement that the Speaker has made, that there has been a seat set apart officially for the use of the Speaker, is all that is necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not the slightest personal desire in the matter except to have it definitely settled; that is all.

Mr. MCNULTA. I move, then, that there be a seat especially set aside for the Speaker in the diplomatic gallery.

The SPEAKER. That is not the question before the House at all; that is the diplomatic gallery.

Mr. MCNULTA. The other is the members' gallery, and it should not be taken from them.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker is a member of the House.

Mr. MCNULTA. I claim the same rights here that every other member is entitled to.

Mr. RANDALL. The seats in the diplomatic gallery are assigned to the representatives of foreign governments, and that is a courtesy between nations; but the right of the Speaker to have particular seats assigned for his use is not governed by any rule of the House; and yet it is perfectly manifest that that right should exist in the Speaker. I am therefore in favor of making firm the right of the Speaker to have such seats at his disposal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires no reference of this matter to the Committee on Rules, for he is a member of that committee. He will bring the matter to a conclusion at once by simply asking if this usage of the House, which has existed immemorially, is to be maintained? The Chair will now submit that question to the House.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. MCNULTA. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know where the evidence is that the immemorial custom of this House is that one member has higher privileges than another?

The SPEAKER. The Chair regards the question as settled; it is not before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we may as well determine that the Speaker shall have some rights and privileges.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I do not like invidious distinctions, and I rise to inquire if some rule could not be established by which all the members of the House could occupy the Speaker's chair?

The SPEAKER. The House has voted to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask what the Chair understands to be the decision of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that by a vote of the House of perfect unanimity, with the exception of one member, the usage of the House has been confirmed.

Mr. MCNULTA. I would like to know what disposition was made of this question of the reserved seats?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the usage of the House, which has been immemorial, was confirmed by a vote to which the gentleman from Illinois alone dissented.

Mr. MCNULTA. I want the Chair to understand that I object; if I am the only man protesting, I propose to protest distinctly against this thing being done.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the gentleman shall have his protest put in writing.

Mr. MCNULTA. That is done sufficienly already.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MCNULTA, will please take the chair in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. MCNULTA in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bills upon the Private Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. This is objection day, and the committee will resume the consideration of the bills on the Calendar at the point where it stopped on last objection day.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The first business upon the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 719) to authorize the issue of patents to lands in cases of private land claims.

The bill was read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is that a private bill?

Mr. DONNAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How can it be? It proposes to regulate surveys.

Mr. DONNAN. It relates solely to private land claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to offer an amendment to that bill, and therefore I object to it.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM C. BRASHEAR.

The next bill upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2198) for the relief of the heirs at law of William C. Brashear, an officer of the Texas navy.

The bill and accompanying report were read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman who reported this bill will inform the committee how much it involves in the way of an appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be in the nature of debate, and this being objection day no debate is in order.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Has not this bill been once before objected to?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that this is the first time the bill has been reached on the Calendar.

Mr. BURLEIGH and Mr. MELLISH objected; and the bill accordingly went over.

WILLIAM B. THOMAS.

The next bill upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2202) for the relief of William B. Thomas, late collector of customs at the port of Philadelphia.

The bill was read.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I move that this bill be laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. Will the gentleman hear the report read?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I am willing to hear the report read, but I reserve my right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

JOSEPH MONTANARI.

The next bill upon the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 311) for the relief of Joseph Montanari, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

Mr. ORTH. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. There is a letter from the Secretary of State upon the subject.

Mr. SPEER. Is not debate in the nature of objection to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is, and the bill will go over.

P. HORNBROOK.

The next bill upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2205) for the relief of P. Hornbrook.

The bill directs the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow, in the accounts of P. Hornbrook, surveyor of customs for the port of Evansville, in the State of Indiana, the sum of $872.35, being amount of payments made to John J. Hays for salary as store-keeper, from December 1, 1870, to December 11, 1871, and vouchers furnished therefor by said P. Hornbrook, and disallowed in the settlement of his accounts for want of oath of said John J. Hays.

The report accompanying the bill was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of P. Hornbrook, respectfully report:

That it appears by letter and communication from the Commissioner of Customs that P. Hornbrook, surveyor of customs for the port of Evansville, Indiana, on December 1, 1870, appointed John J. Hays store-keeper at a salary of $850 per annum, who entered upon his duties at that date, which appointment was on the 5th of December, 1870, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; the said Hays did not take the official oaths in such case required until the 11th of December, 1871, until which time he had not been apprised that any official oath was required; nor was the surveyor of the port aware that an official oath was required in the case of store-keeper. He states that in the case of the approval of his clerk and of his deputy, the Department furnished blank oaths to be administered, but that in the approval of the store-keeper's appointment no blank oath or notice of oath was given; that it appears that P. Hornbrook, surveyor, paid the said Hays for his salary and services from December 1, 1870, to December 11, 1871, at the rate of $850, amounting to $872.35, but for the reason that the said John J. Hays had inadvertently omitted, during said period, to take the required official oaths, the account was not allowed said surveyor; and it appearing that the services were duly rendered; that the said surveyor of the port, P. Hornbrook, paid the said Hays in good faith, and that he ought to be allowed the same in his account, the committee report herewith a bill for his relief, and recommend its passage.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

CREDITORS OF SIOUX INDIANS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 420) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to discharge certain obligations of the United States to the creditors of the Upper and Lower bands of Sioux Indians.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and empowers the Secretary of the Interior to discharge all obligations of the United States to the creditors of the Upper and Lower bands of Sioux Indians, arising under the treaty of June 19, 1858, between said bands and the United States, and from the diversion by the United States of the funds and assets of said Indians in their possession and control applicable to that purpose; provided that the amount allowed and paid on said indebtedness shall in no event exceed the sum of $70,000; and appropriates, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry into effect the provisions of the bill, the sum of $70,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. LAWSON. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House.

No objection was made.

JAMES M. TRUE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2207) for the relief of James M. True, late colonel of the Sixty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry.

The bill, which was read, directs that there be paid to James M. True, late colonel of the Sixty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry, by the proper accounting officers, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the compensation of colonel of infantry from the 20th day of February, 1862, when his recruits were taken from him by order of the Secretary of War, to the 10th day of April, 1862, the day upon which he was mustered in as such.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ROBERT BENT AND JACK SMITH.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 204) for the relief of Robert Bent and Jack Smith.

The bill, which was read, confirms the gift of six hundred and forty acres of land, each, made to Robert Bent and Jack Smith, son of John S. Smith, by the postscript to the treaty concluded with the Arapaho and Cheyenne Indians, February 18, 1861, and directs the Secretary of the Interior to cause patents in fee-simple to be issued for the same to said persons, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, conveying to them all the right, title, interest, and estate of the United States therein.

The Committee on Indian Affairs recommend that the bill be amended by inserting after the word "each" the words "recommended to be;" after the word "persons" the word "or;" strike out the words "assigns or legal representatives," and add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be construed or have the effect to interfere with or impair any rights of any persons to said lands which may have already been acquired under the homestead or pre-emption laws of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there a report accompanying this bill?

Mr. RAINEY. I have here a report in writing.

The report was read, as follows:

Your committee find that in February, 1861, a treaty was entered into between the Arapahoes and Cheyenne tribes of Indians and the United States. Appended to that treaty will be found a postscript embodying the particular request and wish of the chiefs and councilors in general convention, to wit, that a gift from the nation of six hundred and forty acres of land be given to Robert Bent and the same number of acres be given also to Jack Smith, both half-breeds.

The land desired to be conveyed covers the valley and what is called the Sulphur Springs, lying on the north side of the Arkansas River, five miles below the Pawnee Hills, and about seven miles from old Fort Bent. They wish the General Government to recognize and confirm the same.

It is necessary to observe that although this provision is not contained or alluded to in the body of the treaty, it is none the less conceded as being a part and parcel of that instrument. This conclusion is readily reached when we call to mind that it was allowed by the Senate to remain while an important amendment was made to the eleventh article of the treaty. In fact no qualification was given to the actual treaty that was withheld from the postscript; it was signed by the same commissioners, and recognized by the Senate with the accustomed formalities applicable to confirmations, and subsequently embraced within the signature of the President and Secretary of State.

These acts of themselves, in the opinion of your committee, place it beyond the reach of doubt as being in every respect an understood, valid article of the treaty.

At the time of its final execution it was supposed that the Secretary of the Interior had sufficient authority implied, if not forcibly expressed, to warrant his issuing of patents in fee-simple to both Robert Bent and Jack Smith without further legislation.

With this object in view the land was ordered surveyed and set apart for the purpose indicated; subsequently, however, he (the Secretary) has concluded that no such authority is conferred. Having thus concluded, and desiring to act under full authority of law, this bill, at his instance and recommendation, has been introduced and favorably considered by your committee, who now ask that it do pass, not only that authority may be granted to the honorable Secretary of the Interior, but as an act of justice to the claimants and good faith in carrying out the treaty stipulations.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MAJOR ABSALOM BAIRD.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2131) to authorize a promotion in the Inspector-General's Department of the Army of the United States.

The preamble of the bill states that a vacancy of lieutenant-colonel in the Inspector-General's Department of the Army originated on the 13th of June, 1867, to which Major Absalom Baird was entitled to be promoted under the laws then in existence, but from which he was excluded by reason of an appointment in said department previously made; and that an act of Congress approved June 8, 1872, which it was believed would rectify this wrong, has failed to secure to Major Baird his just rights; and the bill authorizes the President to nominate and promote Absalom Baird to be lieutenant-colonel and assistant inspector-general, to date from June 13, 1867.

Mr. SPEER. I think I must object to that bill.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Before the gentleman objects I desire to move an amendment to the bill which I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to offer.

Mr. COBURN. I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] objects to the bill because it gives back pay.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. The amendment I have to offer will obviate that objection.

Mr. SPEER. I will hear the amendment.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I move to amend the bill by adding the following:

Provided, That no officer in said department shall by this act be reduced from his present grade, nor shall any pay or allowance be made to any officer under it except from the date of his promotion.

Mr. SPEER. That amendment will obviate my objection, and I will withdraw it.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

BECK & WIRTH.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2211) for the relief of Beck & Wirth.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object. I think the case should be covered by general legislation.

ALFRED BOLDER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 551) granting a pension to Alfred Bolder.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Alfred Bolder, late a private in Company C, Forty-third Regiment United States Colored Troops, at the rate of eight dollars per month from the passage of the act.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

AUGUSTUS L. YAEGER.

The next bill on the Private Calender was the bill (H. R. No. 1791) granting a pension to Augustus L. Yaeger.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Augustus L. Yaeger, late a sergeant in Company H, Two hundred and fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, who became blind from exposure and disease contracted in the service of the United States.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MARGARET E. WEST.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 62) for the relief of Margaret E. West.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Margaret E. West, widow of Brigadier-General Robert M. West, late captain in the Seventh United States Cavalry, the sum of ——— dollars, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; said General West having died out of the service of the United States of disease contracted in the service of the United States during the late rebellion.

Mr. SPEER. I observe there is a blank in this bill.

Mr. RUSK. That can be filled in the House.

Objection being made, the bill went over.

JOSIAH BRINARD.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 60) granting a pension to Josiah Brinard.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Josiah Brinard, late a private in Company E, Eighty-eighth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, at the rate of eight dollars per month from the passage of the act.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ANN HUMPHREYS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2214) granting a pension to Ann Humphreys, of Philadelphia.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ann Humphreys, widow of Lawrence Humphreys, late a private in Company H, Ninety-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and to pay her a pension from the passage of the act.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

HENRY C. SMITH.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 317) for the relief of Henry C. Smith, of Indianapolis, Indiana.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of War to place the name of Henry C. Smith on the rolls as first lieutenant in Company H, Thirtieth Regiment Indiana Infantry Volunteers, as of the date of June 18, 1865; and that the proper accounting and pay officers shall allow and pay to said Smith the pay and emoluments of a first lieutenant from said date until the date of his discharge, deducting any sum or sums he may have received during said service.

Mr. SPEER. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read as follows:

Henry C. Smith was mustered into service as a veteran volunteer in Company A, Thirty-sixth Indiana Volunteers, on December 21, 1863, was promoted first sergeant May 14, 1865, and was borne upon the rolls and received pay as first sergeant until mustered out of service, November 25, 1865.

Company A, Thirty-sixth Indiana Volunteers, was consolidated with the Thirtieth Indiana Volunteers, and was known as Company H, Thirtieth Indiana Volunteers.

Smith was commissioned as second lieutenant in Thirty-sixth Indiana Volunteers by the governor of the State of Indiana, but was not mustered into service June 1, 1865. He was also commissioned as first lieutenant in Thirtieth Regiment by the governor of Indiana on June 2, 1865, but never mustered.

Smith claims pay of second lieutenant from June 10, 1865, to June 18, 1865, and pay of first lieutenant from June 18, 1865, to November 25, 1865, the date he was mustered out of service.

The records show that Company A, Thirty-sixth Indiana Volunteers, was, before consolidation with the Thirtieth Indiana Volunteers, reduced below the minimum strength, and was not entitled to a second lieutenant during the period for which Smith claims pay.

The records of Company H, Thirtieth Indiana Volunteers, show that while the name of Isaac Dulhagen was borne upon the rolls as first lieutenant during the entire period for which Smith claims to have acted as first lieutenant, they also show that the said Dulhagen was reported absent without leave from June 22, 1865, and never returned to his company, nor has he received pay for services rendered during that time.

Captain John P. Swisher is reported as absent upon detached duty. Smith furnished evidence to show that he did the duty of first lieutenant Company H, Thirtieth Indiana Volunteers, during the period for which he claims pay; and the records show that no other commissioned officer was present with the company during the period specified, and that no person has been paid for the services claimed to have been rendered by Smith.

In view of these facts, your committee recommend that Henry C. Smith, late of Company H, Thirtieth Indiana Volunteers, be allowed the pay and allowances of a first lieutenant from June 18, 1865, to November 25, 1865, less the amount already received by him as pay of first sergeant; and for that purpose they recommend the passage of said bill.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ALMON P. GRAVES.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 20) granting a pension to Almon P. Graves.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Almon P. Graves, of Keene, in the State of New Hampshire, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of the act.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ELIZABETH BRADY.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2215) granting a pension to Elizabeth Brady.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Brady, widow of Marion Brady, sergeant of Company D, Tenth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of the act.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ELIZABETH HACKLEMAN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1832) granting a pension to Elizabeth Hackleman.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Hackleman, widow of Robinson Hackleman, deceased, late a private in Company —, Sixteenth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

CORNELIA A. WASHBURN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2216) granting a pension to Cornelia A. Washburn.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Cornelia A. Washburn, widow of Alfred Washburn, late acting master in the United States Navy.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. PAGE. I withdraw my objection to the bill (S. No. 719) to authorize the issue of patents to lands in cases of private land-claims.

The bill was read. It provides that in case of any claim to land in any State or Territory which has heretofore been confirmed by law, and in which no provision is made by the confirmatory statute for the making of surveys and the issue of patents, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the same to be accurately surveyed in accordance with the provisions of the thirteenth section of an act of Congress approved March 3, 1851, and shall issue patents for the claims so confirmed, upon the presentation to the Commissioner of the General Land Office of plats of survey thereof, duly approved by the surveyor-general of any State or Territory, if the same be found correct by the said Commissioner. But such patents shall only operate as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall in no manner interfere with any valid adverse right, if such exist, to the same land, nor be construed to preclude a legal investigation and decision by the proper judicial tribunal between adverse claimants to the same land. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent therewith are repealed.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Private Land Claims was to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That in case of any claim to land in any State or Territory within the limits of the Territory acquired from Mexico by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and by the treaty commonly known as the Gadsden purchase, excepting the State of California, and in which no provision is made by the confirmatory statute for the making of surveys and the issue of patents, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the proper surveyor-general to accurately survey the same in exact accordance with the act of Congress confirming the claim, and at the expense of the United States, to be paid out of the ordinary appropriations for the public surveys; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall issue patents for the claims so confirmed, upon approval of the plats of survey thereof, in manner hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That whenever either of the surveyors-general as aforesaid shall hereafter, in compliance with the provisions of this act, have caused any claims to lands aforesaid to be surveyed, and a plat thereof to be made, he shall give notice that the same has been done, by publication once a week for four consecutive weeks, in two newspapers, one published at the capital of the State or Territory in which the land surveyed is situated, and one published next the land thus surveyed, and shall retain in his office for public inspection the survey and plat until ninety days from the date of the first publication at the capital of the State or Territory aforesaid shall have expired; and if no objections are made to said survey, he shall approve the same, and transmit a copy of the survey and plat thereof to the Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington for his examination and approval; but if objections are made to said survey within the said ninety days by any party claiming to have an interest in the tract embraced by the survey, or any part thereof, such objection shall be reduced to writing, stating distinctly the interest of the objector, and signed by him or his attorney, and filed with the surveyor-general, together with such affidavits or other proofs as he may produce in support of the objection. At the expiration of said ninety days, the surveyor-general shall transmit to the Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington a copy of the survey and plat, and objections, and proofs filed with him in support of the objections, and also of any proofs produced by the claimant and filed with him in support of the survey, together with his opinion thereon. And if the said survey and plat are approved by the said Commissioner of the General Land Office, he shall indorse thereon his certificate of approval, if disapproved by him, or if, in his opinion, the ends of justice will be subserved thereby, he may require a further report from the surveyor-general touching the matter indicated by him, or proofs to be taken thereon, or may direct a new survey and plat to be made. Whenever the objections are disposed of, or the survey and plat are corrected, or a new survey and plat are made in conformity with his directions, he shall indorse upon the survey and plat adopted his certificate of approval. After the survey and plat have been made as hereinbefore provided, and approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, it shall be the duty of the said Commissioner to cause a patent to issue to the claimant, or his legal representatives, as soon as practicable after such approval.

SEC. 3. That such patents shall only operate as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall in no manner interfere with any valid adverse right, if such exist, to the same land, nor be construed to preclude a legal investigation and decision by the proper judicial tribunal between adverse claimants to the same land: Provided, That this act shall in no manner affect private land claims which have heretofore been surveyed and patented by competent authority.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 719) to authorize the issue of patents to lands in cases of private land claims, make the following report:

This bill is designed to supply an omission in existing legislation. By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo it was provided, in sections 8 and 9 thereof, as follows, to wit:

"ART. 8. Mexicans now established in territories previously belonging to Mexico, and which remain for the future within the limits of the United States, as defined by the present treaty, shall be free to continue where they now reside, or to remove at any time to the Mexican republic, retaining the property which they possess in the said Territories, or disposing thereof, and removing the proceeds wherever they please, without being subjected, on this account, to any contribution, tax, or charge whatever.

"Those who shall prefer to remain in the said territories may either retain the title and rights of Mexican citizens, or acquire those of citizens of the United States. But they shall be under the obligation to make their election within one year from the date of exchange of ratifications of this treaty; and those who shall remain in the said Territories after the expiration of that year without having declared their intention to retain the character of Mexicans shall be considered to have elected to become citizens of the United States.

"In the said Territories property of every kind now belonging to Mexicans not established there shall be inviolably respected.

"The present owners, the heirs of these, and all Mexicans who may hereafter acquire said property by contract, shall enjoy, with respect to it, guarantees equally ample as if the same belonged to citizens of the United States.

"ART. 9. Mexicans who, in the Territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican republic, conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States) to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the Constitution, and in the mean time shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction."

For the purpose of giving effect to the above stipulations, Congress passed a law, approved July 22, 1854, the eighth section of which is as follows, to wit:

"SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general, under such instructions as may be given by the Secretary of the Interior, to ascertain the origin, nature, character, and extent of all claims to lands under the laws, usages, and customs of Spain and Mexico; and for this purpose may issue notices, summon witnesses, administer oaths, and do and perform all other necessary acts in the premises. He shall make a full report on all such claims as originated before the cession of the territory to the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, of 1848, denoting the various grades of title, with his decision as to the validity or invalidity of each of the same under the laws, usages, and customs of the country before its cession to the United States; and shall also make a report in regard to all pueblos existing in the Territory, showing the extent and locality of each, stating the number of inhabitants in the said pueblos, respectively, and the nature of their titles to the land. Such report to be made according to the form which may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; which report shall be laid before Congress for such action thereon as may be deemed just and proper, with a view to confirm bona fide grants, and give full effect to the treaty of 1848, between the United States and Mexico; and until the final action of Congress on such claims, all lands covered thereby shall be reserved from sale or other disposal by the Government, and shall not be subject to the donations granted by the previous provisions of this act." (See Statutes at Large, volume 10, page 309.)

In pursuance of said section 8, act of July 22, 1854, Congress has heretofore confirmed the titles to sundry private land claims under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, but omitted in the confirmatory statutes to provide for the segregation or the patenting of the confirmed claims. The act of June 21, 1860, (Statutes, volume 12, page 71,) provided for survey and patents for claims Nos. 9 and 17, because the legislation for those claims was peculiar and exceptional; but, while confirming the titles, it made no provision for surveying and patenting claims Nos. 1, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 14, 15, 16, 18, and the claim of E. W. Eaton, not numbered in the act. It was probably supposed that the general statute regulating surveys and patents in that class of cases made ample provision, but that was an error. The only act upon the statute-books, namely, December 22, 1854, (Statutes, volume 10, page 599,) was restricted to such claims as had "heretofore been confirmed." By the third section of the act May 30, 1862, (Statutes, volume 12, page 409,) Congress impliedly, and by the act of June 2, 1862, (Statutes, volume 12, page 412,) expressly, provided for such surveys and patents in cases of "all claims or grants of land in any of the States and Territories of the United States derived from any foreign country or government."

Growing out of certain claims advanced by William McGarrahan relative to his "Panoche Grande" rancho, in California, and because there was ample provision in other subsequent statutes for surveys and patents of private land claims in California alone, (see act of July 1, 1864, Statutes, volume 13, page 332,) Congress, February 18, 1871, repealed the act of June 2, 1862, (Statutes, volume 16, page 416.) The effect of this repeal upon the States and Territories, other than California, was apparently not considered by Congress; but the repeal left them in the matter of confirmed private land claims without any legislation to authorize surveys and patents, except the implied authority of the third section act of May 30, 1862. (Statutes, volume 12, page 409.)

Under date of July 27, 1871, Secretary of the Interior Delano decided that this act of May 30, 1862, "applies only to a case where a patent is required to issue." He held that the act of June 21, 1860, which confirmed several grants, did not require the issuing of a patent, is of itself equivalent to a patent, and hence that he was not authorized to survey and patent those confirmed claims.

By reason, therefore, of the absolute repeal of the act of June 2, 1862, and of the official construction given to the third section of the act of May 30, 1862, there is no existing statutory provision by which the locus of these confirmed claims can be defined and the claimants furnished with the usual evidence of title. The proposed bill is designed solely to supply that omission. It has no relation to the questions of titles, but simply provides for segregation and issuing of patents for claims "heretofore confirmed." It does not even deal with titles that may hereafter be confirmed, because that would seem to anticipate future legislation. It is confined to that portion of the United States embraced in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the Gadsden purchase, excepting the State of California. That State is excepted, because the act of July 1, 1864, (Statutes, volume 13, page 332,) makes complete provision therefor, and ample legislation also exists as to similar confirmations within the old French and Spanish cessions.

This bill is as important to the United States as to the confirmees. The title of the latter is already assured by the treaty and the confirmatory statute. But they are reasonably entitled to be furnished, as all similar confirmees have been, with an official survey, and with the usual evidence of title. That is all that is proposed by the accompanying bill. Without the same, any one will readily perceive the great and continued labor and expense that will hereafter be entailed upon the confirmees in suits with settlers under or purchasers from the United States in questions involving the boundaries of their confirmed titles. It is equally apparent that until these confirmed treaty claims are segregated and patented, settlers of the United States cannot know where to locate safely so as not to trespass upon the premises of these confirmees. The United States cannot determine the lines of these claims, and they necessarily extend the lines of the public surveys over these grants, and sell them off under the public land laws. The purchasers and the confirmees are thus thrown into ruinous litigation, which would have been avoided by an official survey and patent. And if the United States do not thus extend their public surveys and offer for sale, then they have to go to the other extreme, and reserve, to avoid possible conflict, much larger tracts than would prove by official survey to have been included in the confirmations.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office has fully considered this subject in his annual reports for 1871, 1872, and 1873. In the General Land Office report for 1871, page 64, is the following, to wit:

"It is most important to the growth and prosperity of these Territories, to which settlement is being rapidly attracted by the extension of railroads, that a separation be made at the earliest possible period between the public lands and those claimed under foreign titles. In this way only can the settler know where to locate safely so as not to intrude on the premises of others. The want of such definitive adjustment of the lines of the public and private lands has already in one instance, brought to notice by the governor of New Mexico, led to armed hostilities between settlers and employés of the grant claimants."

The accompanying bill only provides for the proper survey of those grants which have heretofore been confirmed by acts of Congress, and for the issuing of patents to the confirmees for the same.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, which is a substitute for the original bill, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. SPEER. I raise the question whether it is in order to withdraw an objection after the Committee of the Whole has proceeded to other business.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it to be in accordance with the rules. The objection may, however, be renewed by any member. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] object to this bill?

Mr. SPEER. I do not.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be passed with the amendment.

EDGAR L. SPENCER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 256) for the relief of Edgar L. Spencer.

The bill was read.

Mr. SPEER. I object. I think such cases as this should be covered by a general bill.

HENRY BRUCKNER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2217) granting a pension to Henry Bruckner, late a private of Company F, Fifty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteers.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is thereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Bruckner, late a private of Company F, Fifty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

That they find that Henry Bruckner enlisted as a private in Company F, Fifty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, on the 20th day of November, 1861, and was honorably discharged at Saint Louis, Missouri, on the 31st day of October, 1862, on account of disability; and alleges that on the 4th day of April, 1862, near Pittsburgh Landing, while engaged in digging a sink, under orders, he was hit by a stick in the scrotum so as to cause hernia.

Captain Nichlaw and Frederick Haymeyer, of Company F, Fifty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, testify as to the injury received; that the same occurred as stated by petition, at Pittsburgh Landing, April 4, 1862, and resulted in hernia.

Charles A. Mayer and J. G. Miller, privates, of Fifty-eighth Illinois Volunteers, testify that they were on the detail with petitioner, digging a sink near Pittsburgh Landing, and saw him when he received the injury.

Dr. J. B. Braun, of Chicago, testifies that he was petitioner's family physician before he entered the service, and that at the time of his enlistment he was a sound, healthy man, free from rupture.

Certificate of discharge, dated 31st day of October, 1862, gives hydrocele complication with hernia. Surgeon states that an operation would be tedious, if successful, and recovery doubtful.

Frederick Phillips, a citizen of Chicago, knew the petitioner before he entered the service; that he was a sound man; that he lived in the house with his family, and that his wife frequently showed letters from petitioner, in which he states that he had received an injury at or near Pittsburgh Landing, and was ruptured.

Board of examining surgeons for Chicago, in certificate of examination, dated June 5, 1862, give hernia, and recommend a pension at one-half rate.

In the opinion of your committee, the evidence fully establishes the fact that Henry Bruckner received an injury in the service, and while in the line of his duty, which resulted in hernia, and that he is still suffering from the same; therefore report favorably, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

SARAH SUMMERVILLE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2218) granting a pension to Sarah Summerville.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is thereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah Summerville, widow of Alexander S. Summerville, deputy provost-marshal for the eleventh district of Illinois.

The report was read, as follows:

That it is represented in the petition that Alexander S. Summerville was a deputy provost-marshal under Colonel O'Kane, of the eleventh district of Illinois, and while performing the duties of such deputy in attempting to arrest deserters in the county of Fayette, in said State, on August 24, 1863, was shot and severely wounded by one of these deserters, and died from the effects of said wound on September 7, 1863, leaving Sarah Summerville, his widow, and three minor children. It is further represented that Mrs. Summerville is very poor, in feeble health, and is dependent on the charity of the community in which she resides for the support of herself and children, and asks the passage of a special act placing the name of this destitute family on the pension-rolls.

Your committee find that Alexander Summerville lost his life in the discharge of his duty as deputy provost-marshal in attempting to arrest deserters under proper orders from his superior officer; that he was shot by a deserter in the county of Fayette, Illinois, on the 24th day of August, 1863, and died on the 7th day of September thereafter; that the petitioner, Sarah Summerville, is his widow, and that he left three minor children.

Your committee, in view of all these facts in the case, are of the opinion that Alexander Summerville lost his life while serving his country; that the faithful and energetic discharge of his duties as an officer led to his death, and the appeal of his widow and orphan children to the Government for assistance should not be in vain. Therefore, your committee report favorably, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

PATRICK HICKEY.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2219) granting a pension to Patrick Hickey.

The bill was read. It provides that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is thereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Patrick Hickey, late a private in Company E, First United States Artillery, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

The applicant entered the service of the United States as a private in Company K, Second Regiment United States Artillery, on the 21st day of December, 1843, and served throughout the Mexican war. His Captain, C. F. Smith, testifies to his enlistment and good conduct throughout the war. John J. Peck, brevet major United States Army, makes the following certificate:

JEFFERSON BARRACKS, MISSOURI, January 7, 1849.

This is to certify that Patrick Hickey, late a private in Company K, Second Regiment United States Artillery, served throughout the whole Mexican war with credit to himself and honor to his country.

He participated in every battle, save Buena Vista, and from the occupation of Matamoras until the close of the war was under my immediate command. His character for honesty and integrity was unquestionable, and I reposed entire confidence in him.

JOHN J. PECK,
Brevet Major United States Army.

The above is a true copy of the original, which has been somewhat defaced by wear and tear. I have been personally and officially acquainted with the above-named officer and his signature.

M. D. L. SIMPSON,
Lieutenant-Colonel and Acting Commissary General of Subsistence, Brevet Brigadier-General.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 30, 1867.

From this regiment he was honorably discharged about December 21, 1848. His second enlistment was into Lieutenant Kingsbury's detachment of ordnance, as his discharge shows, on the 1st day of November, 1853, and that he was discharged therefrom, as stated on the face of the discharge, "in consequence of his own application to Major-General Scott, and his recommendation," the 22d day of May, 1854. His character given by his discharge is as follows:

Said Hickey has served honestly and faithfully during his brief term of service, and is believed to be an industrious and trustworthy man.

C. P. KINGSBURY,
Lieutenant of Ordnance.

For the third time he enlisted in the service the 23d day of January, 1855, as a private in Company E, First Regiment United States Artillery. From this service he was discharged the 14th of August, 1857, on account of disability incurred, and from which he is still suffering. The following certificate is taken as good evidence of his injury:

COLEMAN HOUSE, New York, December 5, 1868.

I certify that Patrick Hickey is well known to me; that he served with my command at Fort Dallas, Florida, as a member of my company, (Company E, First United States Artillery,) and that he was discharged therefrom in consequence of debility and night blindness, caused by prostration from the extreme heat in that southern climate, superinduced, to the best of my recollection, by the difficult and arduous service we were called upon to accomplish in order to drive the Seminole Indians from the country. This was in the fall of 1857.

Patrick Hickey is now at the Soldiers' Home in Washington. His character is excellent. His long and faithful services, his piety and sobriety, together with his gallantry shown on numerous battle-fields in the Mexican war, entitle him, in my opinion, to the greatest consideration.

ABNER DOUBLEDAY,
Colonel Thirty-fifth Infantry, Brevet Major-General United States Army.

Your committee, in view of these facts, and the eminent services of this soldier, and the fact that he is now suffering from disability, as is shown by the certificates of examining surgeons, think he is entitled to a pension, and therefore report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ANDREW J. BALDWIN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2220) granting a pension to Andrew J. Baldwin.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is thereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Andrew J. Baldwin, late a corporal in Company G, Tenth Indiana Cavalry Regiment, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of the act.

The report was read, as follows:

Andrew J. Baldwin was a corporal of Company G, Tenth Indiana Cavalry; was captured at Hollow Tree Gap, Tennessee, December 17, 1864, while in pursuit of General Hood, on his retreat from Franklin, Tennessee. While making a charge upon the rebel lines his horse fell and ruptured him, producing inguinal hernia, as termed by the surgeons. Mr. Baldwin was also wounded twice in the charge—once in the leg, once in the right shoulder. He was taken to Andersonville after his capture and placed in prison. There he was affected with the scurvy. He remained six months in prison at Andersonville; had no medical attendance while there, leaving nature to heal his wounds, and used his hands for a truss in pressing his bowels back to their proper position. All of the above facts are clearly proven by his own affidavit and corroborated by those of his comrades. From the time of his capture, and the manner of the service in which he was engaged at the time of his capture, it is simply impossible, in this instance, for Mr. Baldwin to supply the affidavits of his commanding officers or his regimental surgeons. Mr. Baldwin and about thirty soldiers of his regiment were captured with a detachment of Ohio soldiers. Not an Indiana officer or surgeon was with him when captured or wounded. The application for a pension was made in due time, and should have been granted before this date. Three examining surgeons have examined the condition of Mr. Baldwin, and all have agreed that he is permanently disabled.

The committee recommended a pension be given Mr. Baldwin according to his disability.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MARY B. TRIPLETT.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2221) granting a pension to Mary B. Triplett, guardian of the minor heirs of John A. Tomlinson.

The bill was read. It provides that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is thereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary B. Triplett, guardian of the minor heirs of John A. Tomlinson, late of Company B, Second Illinois Cavalry, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of the act.

The report was read, as follows:

Mary B. Triplett, guardian for minor heirs of John A. Tomlinson, deceased, asks for pensions for the following minor children of the deceased:

John A. Tomlinson was a soldier of Company B, Second Illinois Cavalry. Application No. 169618 for such pension was filed January 27, 1869. Petition was refused by the Commissioner of Pensions, February 23, 1870, on the ground that the soldier was not in the line of his duty at the time of his death. Upon an examination of the papers connected with and pertaining to the application, this committee find that while the command to which said John A. Tomlinson belonged was on the march from Clinton, Kentucky, to Fort Pillow, Tennessee, said Tomlinson was permitted to go and see his family, living near by the line of march of the command. He was either killed and thrown into a small lake, or drowned while crossing said lake. His body was found in the water; marks of violence were found upon his person. His horse was found by his comrades near the stream, entangled in some brush. Thomas J. Garison, the captain commanding the company to which said Tomlinson belonged, under oath states that he gave Mr. Tomlinson permission to "go by" and see his family, residing near the road over which the command was traveling.

The marriage of John A. Tomlinson to Miss Wade, now Mary B. Triplett, is proven, as well as the birth of the following-named children, the issue of the marriage between John A. Tomlinson and Miss Wade:

Martha A. E., born 17th January, 1851; John A., born 25th July, 1856; William D., born 11th June, 1858.

The widow of John A. Tomlinson was remarried ——, A. D. 186-, to a Mr. Triplett.

Your committee report in favor of granting a pension to such children as were entitled to a pension under the existing law.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

HUGH WALLACE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 336) granting a pension to Hugh Wallace.

The bill was read. It provides that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is thereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension-laws, the name of Hugh Wallace, late a private in Company F, Forty-sixth Regiment Missouri Infantry Volunteers, from and after the passage of the act.

The report was read, as follows:

Said Wallace entered the service on the 25th of August, 1864, and was honorably discharged therefrom on the 2d day of July, 1865, on account of disease contracted in the service. The Pension Bureau rejected his application, for the reason that he could not furnish the certificate of an officer of his company that the disease on account of which he was discharged was contracted in the line of duty. This he cannot do for the reason that he was serving with a detachment of another command, and absent from his company, by order of the commanding officer at Springfield, Missouri. It is abundantly proven by officers and men of other commands, as well as citizens, that he was a sound, able-bodied man when he entered the service, and that the disease which he contracted by exposure while in the service caused paralysis of his left arm, left side, and partial paralysis of his left leg. His left arm is entirely useless. It is certified that he was a man of steady habits and a faithful soldier, and in view of all the circumstances of the case the committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Upon an examination of the papers referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Forty-third Congress the committee adopt the above report of a previous committee in the case of Hugh Wallace, and recommend that a pension be given to the petitioner, Mr. Wallace.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ROBERT F. WINSLOW.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2223) for the relief of Robert F. Winslow.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States be, and he is thereby, authorized to pay to Robert F. Winslow, of Illinois, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $813.82, for services rendered in raising, drilling, and equipping troops mustered into the United States service during the late war of the rebellion.

The report was read, as follows:

That it has been satisfactorily shown by the statements of Dr. Joseph Shugart, the surgeon of the regiment, and others, that on the 6th day of August, A. D. 1861, the memorialist received authority from the Secretary of War to raise a regiment of infantry volunteers, as appears by a certified copy of the order of said Department, and that immediately thereupon he left a lucrative professional business, yielding him a livelihood for himself and family, and applied himself exclusively, diligently, and in good faith to raising and organizing said regiment; and that in doing so the memorialist necessarily expended $375 in the employment of recruiting officers, and succeeded in enrolling between six and seven hundred men, nearly all of whom were mustered into the military service of the United States in the Fifty-seventh Regiment of Illinois Volunteers.

And further report that said Winslow established a camp of rendezvous and instruction for said volunteers at Princeton, Bureau County, Illinois, and gave his personal attention to their instruction. That he was supplied with tents, subsistence, and camp equipage for said regiment, all of which was in the charge of said memorialist.

That the committee have also been furnished with certified evidence of his excellency Richard Yates, then governor of the State of Illinois, establishing said facts, of which the following are true extracts:

"STATE OF ILLINOIS, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Springfield, March 10, 1862.

"I, Richard Yates, governor of the State of Illinois, do certify that from the best information Colonel Robert F. Winslow rendered most effective service in raising some six or seven hundred men for regiment of which he was, by order of the War Department, to be the colonel. * * * * * * *

"I am informed he spent much time and money in recruiting the men. In my judgment he ought to be compensated in full for both."

By the consolidation of these men with another regiment the memorialist was deprived of all the fruits of his exertions and outlay, and it would be injustice to refuse him compensation for the service he has rendered the country in adding to its effective force in the field a large body of men. The committee further repor tha t the Committee on Military Affairs, to which said claim of said Winslow wa referred at a previous Congress, reported in favor of allowing the same.

Your committee therefore recommend the House of Representatives to allow the said Robert F. Winslow $813.32, being the same rate of pay and commutation allowed by law to colonels of infantry, the same being computed for three months and four days, during which he was actually in charge of said volunteers, to wit, from the 6th day of August, A. D. 1861, to the 10th day of November, in the same year; and to that end report the accompanying bill as a substitute for H. R. 342, and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

EMANUEL SMALL AND JAMES TATE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 2270) making an appropriation to pay Emanuel Small and James Tate, of Atchison County, Missouri, for carrying the mails.

The bill, which was read, provides that there be appropriated the sum of $110 to pay Emanuel Small and James Tate, of Atchison County, Missouri, the amount found by the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury to be due them for carrying the mails of the United States in the said county of Atchison, under a contract with United States, during the years 1868 and 1869; and the Secretary of the Treasury is thereby directed to pay the said Emanuel Small and James Tate, or either of them, the said sum hereby appropriated.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I ask that the following letter be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY
FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 24, 1874.

SIR: Relative to the case of Small and Tate, late mail contractors in 1868-'69, you are informed that payment is withheld for want of an appropriation; and the same cannot be paid until Congress makes an appropriation to cover these back cases.

The amount found to be due is $110.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. J. MARTIN, Auditor.

Hon. ISAAC C. PARKER,
House of Representatives.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

OLIVER POWERS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was a bill (S. No. 366) for the relief of Oliver Powers.

The bill, which was read, provides that Oliver Powers, of Company K, Tenth Tennessee Cavalry, be allowed pay as private from the 15th day of February, 1864, to the day of the muster-out and discharge of said company, together with such bounties and allowances as would have been due him by law had his name remained on the rolls of his company; and that the Pay Department be directed to adjust and pay the same.

The report was read, as follows:

The petition of the claimant shows that Oliver Powers, late private Company K, Tenth Tennessee Cavalry, while on picket duty near Athens, Alabama, was captured by the enemy, ill-treated, and carried into captivity, &c.; that, owing to ill-treatment and robbery of his clothing, he fell sick, was paroled, and left by his captors some thirty miles from Athens, where he remained unable to help himself for six months; then, making his way to his home under great difficulties and suffering, he found that he had, in the mean time, been reported on the rolls as a deserter, and thus is barred of his honorable discharge, back pay, &c. This petition is verified and accompanied by affidavit in due form of J. M. Anderson, late first lieutenant Company K, Tenth Tennessee Cavalry, corroborating petitioner's statements, and stating that before this command was mustered out it was the intention of the company commander to change the rolls so as to relieve petitioner from the charges of desertion, &c., but that the same was neglected. He also testifies to the courage and soldierly qualities and good character of the petitioner.

An intimate knowledge of the country, and the frequent happening of such occurrences, taken in connection with the proofs, warrant belief in the facts stated by the petitioner.

The committee report Senate bill No. 366, authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to correct the record so as to honorably muster out and discharge Oliver Powers, late private Company K, Tenth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, and directing the Secretary of War and accounting officers of the Treasury to pay or cause to be paid to said Oliver Powers, late private Company K, Tenth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, such back pay, bounty, and allowances as he would have been entitled to receive but for the record of his alleged desertion.

Your committee recommend the passage of Senate bill No. 366.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

W. W. ELLIOTT.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 310) fo the relief of W. W. Elliot.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and thereby is, authorized and directed to pay to W. W. Elliott, of Mulberry Grove, Illinois, from the funds of the medical and hospital department, a sum equal to $100 per month from April 20, 1862, to May 29, 1863, the period of his services as an acting assistant surgeon deducting all pay and allowances received by him as an enlisted man during the same period.

The report was read, as follows:

The papers in this case conclusively show that Dr. W. W. Elliott, of Mulberry Grove, Illinois, enlisted as a private in Company G Twenty-second Illinois Volunteers; was detailed by order of General E. A. Paine as acting assistant surgeon of Battery C, First Illinois Light Artillery, and under written contract served as such acting assistant surgeon, being responsible for property, &c., from April 20, 1862, to May 29, 1863, when he was commissioned as first assistant surgeon Fifty-first Illinois Volunteers. He has never received pay except as private for the term he was employed as such acting assistant surgeon. It is fully made out by the papers that such service was important and valuable, and has received the approbation of the Surgeon-General and the Secretary of War. The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

THOMAS T. CRITTENDEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No 1297) for the relief of THOMAS T. CRITTENDEN, of Missouri.

The bill, which was read, provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are thereby, authorized and directed to pass to the credit of THOMAS T. CRITTENDEN, late collector of internal revenue in the fifth collection district of Missouri, the sum of $21,641.56 in the adjustment of his revenue accounts, including the accounts of his deputy collector, John Montgomery, during the period that he was acting collector of that district, the records of their offices having been destroyed by fire, and it being impracticable under existing laws to equitably adjust those accounts; also to credit said THOMAS T. CRITTENDEN in the settlement of his disbursing account the sum of $298.50, the amount paid by him to Assistant Assessor John B. Beiderlinden for services rendered during the months of September, October, and November, 1866, and prior to taking the oath required by law.

The report was read, as follows:

In reply to various letters of inquiry, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has addressed to the committee the following letters, which give a full and clear statement of the facts on which this claim is based:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, February 17, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 13th instant, relative to the claim of Hon. T. T. CRITTENDEN, late collector internal revenue, fifth district Missouri, containing a series of questions; and I reply to the same in order, as follows:

1. Mr. CRITTENDEN was appointed collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Missouri August 21, 1866. He took possession of the office October 23, 1866 As his appointment was not confirmed by the Senate, it expired upon the adjournment of Congress, March 3, 1867, as per act of March 2, 1867, section 3, and the duties of the office devolved upon John Montgomery, his principal deputy, who became acting collector, as provided in the act of June 30, 1864, section 40, as amended March 2, 1867, section 9. The records of this office show, however, that the date when Mr. CRITTENDEN actually transferred the office to Mr. Montgomery was April 20, 1867. Mr. John Montgomery continued in office as acting collector of this district from April 20, 1867, until January 19, 1868, when he was succeeded by W. J. Chandler, Ap collector.

3. Mr. CRITTENDEN was notified of the expiration of his commission by a telegram from this office dated March 4, 1867, and also by letter dated April 4, 1867. (See copies herewith.)

4. A representative of this office visited Sedalia, Missouri, in October, 1871, for the purpose of making an investigation into the facts connected with the administration of the office of collector by Mr. CRITTENDEN and Mr. Montgomery, and, if possible, effect a settlement of their accounts with the Government. He found no records, or assessment lists, or papers of any kind pertaining to the office of collector for the period embraced in Mr. CRITTENDEN's term of office, and was told, and had good reasons to believe, that these records had all been destroyed by a fire that commenced in a building adjoining the one occupied as collector's office, and in a very short time burned that and a number of other buildings, all being constructed of wood.

The records of the office that covered the period from November 7, the date of the fire mentioned, to January 19, 1868, he was informed by Mr. Montgomery, had been placed in the office of the assessor of that district, and destroyed in the fire that burned that office in January, 1871.

This statement was confirmed by Mr. Leaming, the assessor, and others. He discovered no evidence in any way connecting either Mr. CRITTENDEN or Mr. Montgomery with the origin of either of these fires. Owing to the absence of all these records and papers he was unable to do anything towards effecting a settlement of the account. Another officer of this office visited Sedalia, Missouri, in June, 1873, and reported substantially the same facts stated above.

5. Both of the agents of this office referred to reported that Mr. CRITTENDEN and Mr. Montgomery were willing to do anything in their power to effect a settlement of their accounts, but in the absence of the records and requisite data were utterly unable to comply with the requirements of the law and regulations.

Claims for the abatemnt of a large portion of the outstanding taxes were prepared by Mr. Montgomery, which he was unable to complete owing to the absence of the assessment lists, as above stated.

6. The various reports required of collectors appear to have been made by both Mr. CRITTENDEN and Mr. Montgomery during their terms of office, and the affairs of the office properly conducted.

7. At the expiration of the term of office of Mr. Montgomery, acting collector, the instructions of this office relative to the transfer of the office to W. J. Chandler, his successor, appear to have been promptly complied with.

8. Mr. CRITTENDEN's account as "stamp-agent" has been settled in full, and closed upon the books of the Dapartment.

9. From the evidence on file in this office and the reports of the agents herein referred to, I have no reason to believe that the affairs of the office of that district were not properly conducted by both Mr. CRITTENDEN and Mr. Montgomery during their incumbency, and I am satisfied that in the absence of all the office records the uncollected taxes now standing charged to the account of Mr. CRITTENDEN cannot be accounted for by him, as required by the law and regulations of the Department.

10. The information obtained by the agent of the Department who visited Sedalia in October, 1871, was that the fire occurred at night, when the office was closed, and that neither Mr. Montgomery nor any of his clerks reached the spot in time to save anything whatever; that the town was composed at that time almost entirely of two-story frame buildings, which under a high wind burned with great rapidity.

11. The records of this office show that John B. Biederlinden was duly commissioned as assistant assessor August 17, 1865, but that he did not take the oath of office required by act July 2, 1862, (volume 12, page 502 of Statutes) until November 30, 1866. The payment made to him by Mr. CRITTENDEN was for twenty-two days' service in September, 1866, twenty-five days' service in October, 1866, and twenty-three days' service in November, 1866, which, though actually performed, could not be legally paid for, as he was not at that time a qualified officer.

Very respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS,
Commissioner.

GEORGE C. SMITH, Esq.,
Clerk Committee on Claims, House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, April 4, 1867.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 29th of March, I have to say that your term of office expired on the 3d of March. On the 4th of March the following telegram was sent to you:

"Your commission having expired, office devolves upon your senior deputy. Report his name."

Very respectfully,

THOMAS HARLAND,
Deputy Commissioner.

T. T. CRITTENDEN, ESQ.
Warrensburgh, Missouri.

UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE,
COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, FIFTH DISTRICT MISSOURI,
Carthage, 2d, 24, 1874.

SIR: Understanding your committee have under advisement a bill for the relief of Hon. T. T. CRITTENDEN, M. C., late collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Missouri, I take pleasure in stating to your committee that I am the present collector of said district, and have had charge of said office since June, 1871. A sense of justice compels me to volunteer the statement that while Mr. CRITTENDEN stands charged with the full amount of lists receipted for to the assessor during his term of office, the offices of both assessor and collector of said district were entirely destroyed by fire, leaving the collector without the data or means for reducing his liability; and that the whole amount for which relief is asked is solely owing to the loss of said lists, his other obligations having, according to the records of this office, been fully and promptly met.

From personal acquaintance with Mr. C. I would gladly testify to his high standing in community as a gentleman of high sense of honor and strictest integrity, and I would be pleased to hear of your favorable report on the bill for his relief, and hope Congress will do him the justice to pass the same.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

D. H. BUDLONG,
Collector Fifth District of Missouri.

Hon. JOHN Q. SMITH,
Chairman Sub-committee.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, February 25, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, relative to your bill for relief now pending before Congress, in which you ask the following question:

"Does the amount covered by the bill introduced into Congress by General STANARD, of Missouri, for the relief of myself, as late collector fifth district of Missouri, embrace, as far as shown by the records of your office, the full ascertained sum charged against myself, not otherwise accounted for, for which I should be released, and for which I cannot account, by reason of the loss of the assessment lists and records by the fire at Sedalia, Missouri?"

In reply I would say that it does. It is the balance now outstanding as uncollected assessments upon the lists receipted for to the assessor by yourself and Mr. Montgomery, which do not appear to have been either collected or abated, being as stated, $21,641.56.

Very respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS,
Commissioner.

Hon. T. T. CRITTENDEN,
House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, February 27, 1874.

SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of a letter of John Montgomery, late acting collector internal revenue fifth district of Missouri, dated November 18, 1867, giving a detailed account of the circumstances of the fire that destroyed his office and office records on the night of the 6th of November, 1867, referred to in the bill for relief of late Collector CRITTENDEN and Acting Collector Montgomery, now before Congress.

I also inclose a copy of a letter from the assessor, M. J. Leaming, dated January 2, 1871, announcing the fact that his office was destroyed, with all its records, on that day.

The representative of this office who visited Sedalia, Missouri, in October, 1871, was informed both by Mr. Montgomery and Mr. Leaming, the assessor, that in this second fire of January 2, 1871, most of the records accumulated by Mr. Montgomery after the fire of November 6, 1867, were then destroyed, having been placed in the assessor's office for safe-keeping.

Very respectfully,

_____,
Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN Q. SMITH,
Committee on Claims. House of Representatives.

UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE,
DEPUTY COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, FIFTH DISTRICT MISSOURI,
Sedalia, Missouri, January 2, 1871.

SIR: It becomes my painful duty to report to you that the assessor's office of the fifth district, together with all the books, papers, records, &c., pertaining thereto, was totally destroyed by fire this morning between four and five o'clock. The fire had progressed so far before being discovered that it was absolutely impossible to save anything, and all the records of the office are completely destroyed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

MACK J. LEAMING,
Assessor.
By MORRIS TRUMBULL,
Chief-Clerk.

Hon. J. W. DOUGLASS,
Acting Commissioner Internal Revenue, Washington, D. C.

UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE,
ACTING COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, FIFTH DISTRICT MISSOURI,
Sedalia, November 18, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 13th instant, directing that I will inform you of the origin of the fire in which my books and papers were destroyed, together with the circumstances connected therewith, and that I adopt vigorous measures to replace the records, and that I apply to the assessor for copies of the assessment lists destroyed.

I have the honor to report in reply thereto that the fire originated in a small provision store, in the same block and two doors east of our office, by the explosion of a kerosene or coal-oil lamp. These buildings were all light frame buildings and very dry, the drought from which we are suffering having made them very easy to burn, and, from want of water, exceedingly hard to put out when once ignited. Our office was in a two-story frame building, the upper rooms of which were used as offices, the lower room as a store-room by a firm of merchants. The fire commenced about half-past eleven o'clock on the evening of the 6th instant, the flames spreading with such rapidity that few things were saved from any of these buildings near the one where the fire originated. I was not at home the night of the fire, having gone the same day to Jefferson City, but I believe every possible exertion was made to save all valuables in the building. My office was the back room up-stairs, and while a few things were saved below and in the front offices, little or nothing was saved from mine. These facts I give as I learn them from witnesses and know of the premises.

We were not careless in having our office in a place as liable to fire as this, because there are few houses in our city, on Main street particularly, that are not frame. A good office could not be procured except it were as much liable to fire as ours was. I have officed in this same building since April, 1865, and felt little uneasiness from fire, to learn, alas, in the end, that our long immunity from danger did not protect us.

I am doing all that can be done to replace our records, having already obtained from the assessor his original assessment lists, and am now engaged in making copies of them, taking new bonds from distillers, brewers, and tobacconists.

We have lost our statement of account between ourselves and Treasury Department, and, though we can in a measure replace it, we would much like a copy of account from your records.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JNO. MONTGOMERY,
Acting Collector.

Hon. THOMAS HARLAND,
Deputy Commissioner Internal Revenue.

From the facts stated in the foregoing letter, the committee are clearly of the opinion that Mr. CRITTENDEN was in no way to blame for the destruction of the assessment lists of uncollected taxes for his district, and that he ought not in any way to be held responsible therefor. Mr. CRITTENDEN was not in possession of the office of collector at the time it was destroyed by fire. He was not in receipt of any of its emoluments, and there is no equity in holding him responsible for losses over which he could have no possible control.

The law, as it applies to Mr. Crittenden's case, seems to hold him responsible long after his connection with the office ceased. It was impossible for him to relieve himself of that responsibility until his successor was appointed and qualified. That was postponed from April 20, 1867, when Mr. CRITTENDEN turned over the office to Mr. Montgomery, until January 19, 1868.

It is the opinion of the Department that Mr. CRITTENDEN and Mr. Montgomery were faithful officers; that, so far as they have been able to do so, they have made full and satisfactory settlement with the Department; that, in consequence of the losses of the assessment lists, it is impossible that they can complete their settlement. The bill under consideration is to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to allow a credit to Mr. CRITTENDEN of the amount with which he stands charged. The bill also provides that Mr. CRITTENDEN should receive credit for the sum of $298.50, the amount paid by him to Assistant Assessor John B. Beidenlinden for services which were performed after he was commissioned and before he took the oath of office, because of which neglect the money actually paid him by Mr. CRITTENDEN could not be credited by the Department. This neglect to take the oath of office by Beidenlinden we suppose was a mere inadvertence; at all events, he seems to have performed the duties, and was paid therefor, and it would seem to be just that Mr. CRITTENDEN should be credited with the sum so paid.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be favorably reported to the House.

JOHN CLINTON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2345) for the relief of John Clinton, postmaster at Brownsville, Tennessee.

The bill, which was read, provides that the proper accounting officer of the Treasury be, and he is thereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $265.35 to John Clinton or his legal representative, the same to be in full of all claim for money stolen from the post-office at Brownsville, Tennessee, on the 1st day of November, 1870.

The report was read, as follows:

The memorialist was postmaster at Brownsville, Tennessee, on the 1st of November, 1870; he had securely deposited on that day, in the money-drawer of the post-office, (kept expressly for that purpose, and no other,) the sum of $285.37 of money-order funds belonging to the United States Post-Office Department; that the said drawer and post-office were properly locked; but while said memorialist was absent at dinner the said post-office was burglariously entered, and said drawer opened by false keys, and said money stolen; that twenty dollars of it was recovered from the thief, but no more.

The said memorialist has paid said money to the United States Post-Office Department. Your committee find that he was not guilty of negligence in the loss of said money; and it being clearly shown in the amended petition that the memorialist fully intended to do what was his daily practice, i. e., send that same night by the mail to the post-office at Memphis the proceeds taken during the said day, but was prevented by the robbery taking place during his temporary absence to dinner, your committee recommend that the sum of $265.37 be appropriated for the relief of said memorialist, and herewith report to that effect a substitute for the said bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be favorably reported to the House.

W. A. SAYLER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2346) for the relief of W. A. Sayler, of Bryan, Texas.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to refund the sum of $1,871.53 to W. A. Sayler, of Bryan, Texas, for taxes illegally collected on certain parcels of cotton during the years 1867 and 1868; and appropriates the sum of $1,871.53, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose aforesaid.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

REV. GEORGE MORRISON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2348) for the relief of Rev. George Morrison, late of Kentucky.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Rev. George Morrison, late of Kentucky, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $150, in full payment for one horse and equipments captured by the enemy during the late war, while in the service of the United States.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

LEMUEL C. RISLEY.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 799) for the relief of Lemuel C. Risley, late a second lieutenant of the Eighty-fifth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to pay Lieutenant Lemuel C. Risley the full amount of pay and emoluments as a second lieutenant of the Eighty-fifth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, from the 26th day of November, 1864, to the 31st day of January, 1865; provided that any sum of money which shall have been paid to the said Lemuel C. Risley as a non-commissioned officer or private for said period be deducted from said amount to be paid to him as second lieutenant.

Mr. BARBER. I would like to hear the report read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred House bill No. 799, for the relief of Lemuel C. Risley, late a second lieutenant of the Eighty-fifth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, beg leave to report:

That it appears from the papers in the case that Lieutenant Risley was commissioned on the 21st day of September, 1864, second lieutenant in the Eighty-fifth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, he being at the time sick in hospital (on sick leave) at Indianapolis, Indiana. On the 20th of November, 1864, he received his commission. He started to rejoin his regiment, then with General Sherman in Georgia, but on reaching Chattanooga he was stopped by order of General Cruft, then in command there. General Sherman having started on his march to the sea, and communication being cut off, it was impossible to reach his army by that route. Hood's army was then moving northward, threatening Nashville. General Cruft ordered all the unassigned soldiers and officers then at Chattanooga into battalions, and on the 26th day of November, 1864, he assigned Lieutenant Risley to the command of one of these battalions, and he continued in that command through all the battles that ensued near Franklin and Nashville, Tennessee, for several weeks, though he had not been mustered in. Finally, on the 31st day of January, 1865, he was mustered in as second lieutenant, under his said commission at Goldsborough, North Carolina. The committee find that from the 26th day of November, 1864, to the 31st day of January, 1865, Lieutenant Risley performed the duties of a second lieutenant, and should receive pay as such, deducting the sum paid him for that period as a non-commissioned officer or private soldier, and they accordingly recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. BARBER. I ask that that bill be passed over.

Mr. CLYMER. If the gentleman will hear the report read I am satisfied it will convince him that the bill ought to pass.

Mr. BARBER. I will hear the report.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 166) providing for the sale of an island, or middle ground, in the Saginaw River, in the State of Michigan, ask to report:

That they have had the same under consideration, and find the following to be the facts in the case: That the original survey of the lands and river does now show the island to have existed at that time. The lands were sold to individuals, according to the subdivisions as represented by said survey. Subsequent to said survey there has appeared the island as forming from the bed of the stream, leaving a channel on each side thereof, but much narrower than the original. The said island of late years has become of such size as to be of considerable importance and value, but only as the property in front thereof has increased; and the narrowness of the channels on each side of the island has detracted very much from the value of the property on the main shores, besides detracting largely from the capacity and facilities of doing the business on shores to which the same have been generally applied. It appears that the parties owning the shores opposite thereto, believing that, as a matter of right and equity, their rights, as riparian owners, extended to the center of the channel or bed of the stream from the meanderal lines of the river respectively, each took possession of so much of said island as lies in front of land owned by them to the center line of the island, and have continued to occupy the same, and have expended large amounts of money in making improvements thereon, in some cases amounting to thousands of dollars. The parties occupying and in possession of the respective portions of the island claimed by them believe that they were justified in such occupancy and improvement. The Committee on the Public Lands have submitted the question to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and received the following communication in reply thereto:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the papers filed by you 7th instant respecting what is known as the "middle ground" in Saginaw River, Michigan, together with a copy of a letter to this office, dated 6th ultimo, from P. C. Andre, esq., of Saginaw.

This middle ground appears to have been, at the date of the public surveys, a part of the bed of the river covered by its waters. No public survey of it was attempted, and no island is reported in the stream at this point.

In March, 1856, a survey was made upon the ice by the county surveyor, who certifies that no survey could be accomplished in any other manner, the grounds being so constantly under water as to render it impracticable to make the attempt.

This survey was filed in this office, but was not considered as entitled to approval as a survey of public lands, and was not so approved.

Congress, however, on the 15th July, 1870, evidently without an examination of the questions involved, passed joint resolution No. 140, directing the issue of patent to Stephen Marston for a portion of said grounds described by metes and bounds, upon payment by him of the sum of $100.

The Commissioner, my predecessor in office, for the purpose of carrying the law into effect, on the 10th August, 1870, indorsed on the said plat of survey his qualified approval, as ex-officio surveyor-general of Michigan, and subsequently issued the patent accordingly.

Understanding that you wish my opinion upon the question of the power of Congress to dispose of this ground as public land, I have examined the facts as above recited, and would state that I do not regard it as in any sense public land, the property of the United States, but consider it properly within the jurisdiction of the State of Michigan, and subject to her laws.

The rights of the owners of the shore having been also called to my attention, I will give you a few authorities, decisions of the Federal courts, which seem to have direct application to this case, and will indicate the United States law upon both points.

Rivers are deemed navigable waters of the United States when they are used or are suitable of being used, in their ordinary condition, as highways for commerce between the States. (The Daniel Ball, 10 Wallace, 557; The Montello, 11 Wallace, 411.)

Under the acts of Congress relating to the survey and sale of public lands bordering on rivers, the right of a grantee of lands bordering on a navigable river stops at the stream, and does not extend to the medium filum. But such riparian proprietors have the same rights to construct suitable landings and wharves for the convenience of commerce and navigation as riparian owners on navigable waters affected by the ebb and flow of the tide. (Railroad Company vs. Schurmeir, 7 Wallace 272.)

The owner of land bounded by a navigable river (whether his title extend to the middle of the stream or not) has a right of free access thereto, and of erecting a landing, wharf, or pier for his own use or that of the public. These rights are to be enjoyed subject to such general rules as the Legislature may prescribe for the protection of the public rights; they cannot be taken for public use except due compensation be made. (Yates vs. Milwaukee, 10 Wallace 497)

At the revolution the people of each State, in their sovereign character, acquired the absolute right to all navigable waters and the soil under them. (Martin vs. Waddell, 16 Peters, 307; Russell vs. Jersey Company, 15 Howard, 426.)

The shores of navigable rivers and the soil under them were not granted by the Constitution to the United States, but were reserved to the States respectively; and new States have the same rights, sovereignty, and jurisdiction over this subject as the original ones. (Pollard vs. Hagan, 3 Howard, 212; Pollard vs. Kibbe, 9 Howard, 471; Hallett vs. Beebe, 13 Howard, 25; Withers vs. Buckley, 20 Howard, 84.)

The foregoing will be sufficient to show that, if this ground was of the bed of the stream on the admission of the State, she has sovereignty over it, and the laws for the disposal of the public domain can have no application to it subsequently.

Very respectfully,

WILLIS DRUMMOND,
Commissioner.

RELINQUISHMENT OF UNITED STATES RIGHTS IN CERTAIN LANDS.

The bill (H. R. No. 2539) relinquishing the rights of the United States in certain lands in the State of Michigan was reported by the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to the passage of that bill, and ask that it be read.

The bill was read.

Mr. CLYMER. After very careful and long consideration the Committee on the Public Lands, by a unanimous vote, directed this bill to be reported by myself, and I think that when my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] understands the nature of it he will withdraw his objection. This little island is in reality a sand-bar, formed near the mouth of the Saginaw River. At the time the lands were surveyed in the neighborhood, it was not in existence. It is not marked upon any of the maps of the Department. It has risen since. Sir, it is so nearly a sand-bar even now, that only at low-water is there any land appearing above the surface of the stream. The object of this bill is to give to the riparian owners on either side the right to this sand-bar according to a line drawn through it, to which consent shall be given. On the main shore there are valuable improvements in the shape of saw-mills. The owners on either shore have gone on this sand-bar, and have, by means of wharfage put up at their own expense, effected large improvements on this sand-bar.

The committee, to see that the United States was not damaged by this bill, inquired of the Commissioner of the General Land Office as to any title the United States might be presumed to have in this sand-bar. He has answered that the Government cannot by any possibility have any title thereto, as at the time the surveys were made it did not exist. The island has appeared since.

Mr. RANDALL. If the United States owns no title it has none to relinquish.

Mr. CLYMER. I would say in reply to my colleague that this is done to quiet title. I trust that the House, understanding the matter, will pass the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

GENERAL A. C. VORIS.

The bill (H. R. No. 2671) granting a pension to General A. C. Voris, late colonel of the Sixty-seventh Ohio Volunteers, was reported by the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill may be read.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of General A. C. Voris, late colonel of the Sixty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of thirty dollars a month, the same to commence from the date of his discharge from the service of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill provides that the pension shall commence "from the date of his discharge." I ask that the report may be read in order that it may be seen whether the bill ought not to be amended.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of General A. C. Voris, late colonel of the Sixty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteers, beg leave to report:

That General A. C. Voris entered the service in January, 1862, as lieutenant-colonel of the Sixty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry; received promotion for gallant and distinguished service until he reached the rank of brevet major-general. He was severely wounded on the 18th day of July, 1863, in an assault on Fort Wagner, South Carolina, by a gun-shot wound in the abdomen. The ball struck his sword-belt ring and divided into unequal parts, the smaller part lodging in the muscles that support the abdomen, the larger portion passing downward and backward, and lodging in the upper surface of the bladder, where it remained until about the 1st of November, 1872, when it broke through the walls of the bladder, and there remained until removed by surgical operation, on the 24th day of November, 1873.

General Voris states that he was entirely deceived by finding the smaller piece of lead shortly after he was hurt, and did not know from what cause he was suffering until the bullet was found in his bladder. General Voris states that he has suffered great pain at times from the date of his wound up to the operation, and supposed he was suffering from paralytic rheumatism; further states that he has expended at least $500 for medical services, and asks that he be granted a pension; that he has never applied for a pension, for the reason that he could not determine his disease and did not know that he was so clearly entitled until after the surgical operation.

Dr. Thomas McEbright, of Acton, Ohio, United States pension surgeon, states that he has attended General Voris for some months, and assisted in the operation for stone in the bladder. He fully corroborates the statements of General Voris. His affidavit is herewith filed and made part of this report.

In view of all the facts in the case, the distinguished services of General Voris, his great suffering from the wound received in the service and in the line of duty, your committee report favorably, and recommend the passage of a special act granting a pension at the rate of thirty dollars per month, same to commence from the date of the discharge of General Voris from the service of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the several votes by which the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOMES FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. SPEER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire whether the system adopted by the board of managers of the national military homes for disabled volunteer soldiers of deducting any fines and forfeitures imposed upon any of the beneficiaries of the institution for alleged breaches of discipline are in accordance with the spirit and meaning of the pension laws, and whether any such fines can legally be deducted from the monthly pay of the said volunteers, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SPEER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. DURHAM. With the assent of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I ask leave to withdraw the bill and accompanying papers in the case of Oliver Marcum, of Russell County, Kentucky, for an increase of pension.

The SPEAKER. Is there an adverse report in the case?

Mr. DURHAM. There is not; the bill is before the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary for the gentleman to withdraw the bill. If there be no objection leave will be granted for the withdrawal of the papers. The Chair hears none.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PRATT was granted leave of absence until the 8th of April.

Mr. TAYLOR was granted leave of absence for ten days.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania, was granted leave of absence for one week.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 4, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLING AND LICENSING OF VESSELS.

Mr. NEGLEY. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to ask unanimous consent to report for action at this time the bill (H. R. No. 2549) to amend the act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting-trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," passed February 18, 1793.

The bill was read. It provides that the act to which it is a supplement shall not be so construed as to extend the provisions of the said act to canal-boats or boats employed on the internal waters or canals of any State; and that all such boats, excepting only such as are provided with sails or propelling machinery of their own adapted to lake or coastwise navigation, and excepting such as are employed in trade with the Canadas, shall be exempt from the provisions of the said act and from the payment of all customs and other fees under any act of Congress.

Mr. NEGLEY. If any gentleman desires information in regard to this bill, I will have read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject. I will add that the bill has been very carefully considered by the Committee on Commerce, and has the unanimous approval of that committee.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to hear the clause read again in relation to Canada.

The bill was again read.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to ask if this bill has been considered by the Committee on Commerce and is unanimously reported by them?

Mr. NEGLEY. It is the unanimous report of the committee, and it is also recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I do not wish to oppose this bill, but there have been various remonstrances sent here by the Chamber of Commerce of New York and by the pilot commissioners, and I would ask if the committee have considered their statements and arguments against the bill?

Mr. NEGLEY. This bill only relates to canal-boats and boats employed on internal waters.

Mr. PARSONS. This bill does not relate to the point to which the gentleman refers.

No objection being made, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEGLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN CONTRACTS.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the resolution passed by this House on the 10th day of March last directing the Committee on Indian Affairs to investigate the matter of contracts for Indian supplies and transportation for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873, and June 30, 1874, be so amended and enlarged as to require said committee to make a thorough investigation into all frauds, unfairness, or irregularity, if any, connected with the administration of Indian affairs for the years named, and that said committee make report thereon as required by the resolution aforesaid.

Mr. AVERILL. I would ask the gentleman if he desires to introduce that resolution for reference or for adoption?

Mr. ADAMS. I ask unanimous consent to have the resolution adopted.

Mr. AVERILL. As the Committee on Indian Affairs has been considering a resolution similar in character to this, I must object unless the resolution be referred to that committee. I have no objection to its reference.

Mr. ADAMS. I would remind the gentleman that yesterday in conversation with him and with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS,] another member of the committee, they suggested that I had better introduce the resolution on my own account.

Mr. AVERILL. That was an individual conversation, and was not known to the committee.

There being no objection, the resolution was received, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SUSPENSION OF OFFICERS IMPEACHED.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill to prevent maladministration in the civil service of the United States by its officers against whom articles of impeachment have been presented. I desire its consideration at this time. It has been unanimously agreed to by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information.

The bill provides that whoever, being a civil officer of the United States, except the President and Vice-President of the United States, shall be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors by the House of Representatives before the Senate of the United States, shall thereupon be suspended from the functions and authority vested in him by virtue of his office, and until he shall be discharged from such impeachment by the judgment of the Senate or by the withdrawal of such impeachment by the House of Representatives; and the duties, functions, jurisdiction, and powers of each such suspended officer during the term of such suspension may be exercised by any other officer authorized by law to exercise the functions of office in case of the resignation, death, or disability of any such civil officer of the United States, or in case no provision is made by law, the President is authorized to appoint an officer with like powers, jurisdiction, and authority to perform the duty of such suspended officer during the time for which he shall remain so suspended, who shall receive the salary, pay, and emoluments which belong to such offices.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will raise no objection to this bill; but I give notice that after this I shall insist upon the regular order, a thing which I believe I have never done before.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve my right to object, until the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has had an opportunity to explain the bill.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to make a brief statement to the House, after which I think there will be no objection to this bill, which has been pretty carefully considered by the Committee on the Judiciary. It simply provides that where any officer of the United States, excepting the President and Vice-President of the United States, shall have been impeached by the House before the Senate, during the time of his trial he shall be suspended from the duties of his office, which shall devolve upon the person designated by law in case of a vacancy, or in case there is no provision of law to that effect, the President may appoint an officer ad interim.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does that include judges of the Supreme Court?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It does; and I will tell the gentleman why. That provision is made in view of certain cases of judges. We have before the Committee on the Judiciary now various charges against some three judges, involving their honesty, integrity of judicial administration, and rectitude of character. While they are impeached by the House, under an impeachment by the judgment of the House, they can still go on and discharge the duties of their offices, and decide important questions and cases. I have now in my mind one judge, whose name I will not mention, because I do not desire to prejudge the case of any one, against whom it is alleged that as soon as he can hold his court long enough to clear up all the business for his friends he will resign. That may or may not be true.

We have the case of the Kansas judge who was impeached before the Senate for drunkenness and incapacity for holding the office. The Senate had not time to try him during that session. He went on and incumbered his office, being, as the testimony afterward showed, beastly drunk, and held over until the beginning of this Congress, and when we began to move against him again he resigned. It is a great scandal that an officer impeached for want of integrity and for incompetency, especially a judge, should continue to hold office and discharge its duties. When the House of Representatives solemnly present to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against an officer for high crimes and misdemeanors, I think it should operate at least as much a suspension as the mere suspension by the President of an officer until the next session of Congress.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right here?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Is there any doubt in the mind of the gentleman about the construction of this bill as to when the office would be vacated?

The SPEAKER. As there was a mistake the other day, the Chair wants it distinctly understood whether this bill is or is not now before the House.

Mr. SPEER. I will object to the bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I would suggest to my colleague to set this bill down for some future time; it involves very grave constitutional questions.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am willing to do that.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Fix some one day for its consideration.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am willing to name any day that will be convenient, say two weeks from to-day.

Mr. SPEER. I have no objection to that; I simply want time to examine the bill.

Mr. MOREY. I object.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, that will not save Durell.

Mr. MOREY. If you want to impeach Durell do it directly, not indirectly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not want to do it indirectly. You will have enough of it before we get through.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour now begins at twenty minutes before one o'clock. The call of committees for reports of a private nature will be resumed.

TITLE TO HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION, ARKANSAS.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 608) extending the time for filing suits in the Court of Claims to establish title to the Hot Springs reservation, in Arkansas.

Mr. HYNES. I make the point that this bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point. The bill will be so referred.

M. H. PLUNKETT.

Mr. HAYS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2801) to place on the retired list of the Navy M. H. Plunkett, late second assistant engineer of the regular Navy; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the President of the United States to nominate and appoint M. H. Plunkett, late second assistant engineer in the regular naval service, on the retired list of the Navy, with pay to begin from the passage of the act.

Mr. HOLMAN. Must not this bill go the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

Mr. HAYS. The bill does not appropriate one dollar. I hope the gentleman will allow the bill to be passed. It merely restores an officer to the retired list of the Navy.

The SPEAKER. The point of order, if made, clearly lies against the bill. It proposes to establish an office that does not now exist, and defines the date from which the pay shall begin. It will require an expenditure of money.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the bill create an additional office?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again read the bill.

The bill was again read.

The SPEAKER. Could this man be appointed under existing law?

Mr. HAYS. He could not.

The SPEAKER. Then of course this bill involves an expenditure which would not otherwise be made.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It proposes to place a new man in office, but it does not create a new office.

The SPEAKER. The man is not in office now, and this bill proposes to put him in office.

Mr. HAYS. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will withdraw his point.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman withdraws the point, of course the bill can be considered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to hearing the report read.

The report, which was read, states that M. H. Plunkett entered the regular Navy July, 1858, and served as a second and third assistant engineer until May, 1865. He was captured on board of the United States steamer Harriet Lane, off Galveston, January 1, 1863, by rebel gun-boats, and was imprisoned in a rebel prison for eleven months and two weeks, therein contracting disease of the heart and lungs, which physically disqualified him for service in the Navy. He was ordered for examination May, 1864, and was discharged without examination, as the medical board, composed of Surgeons Dillard, McClelan, and Gaugus, United States Navy, reported that he was physically disqualified for promotion or sea-duty. This entitled him to go on the retired list of the Navy. (See acts of August 3, 1861, section 22; also act of April 21, 1864, section 4.) He resigned May, 1865, on account of having been cut off from all prospects of promotion or advancement in the service, and in the hope that he might recover his health and not be an incumbrance on the Government. By his doing so there was saved to the Government the amount that would have been paid to him from the date of his resignation to the present time.

The medical certificate dated March 6, 1871, signed William Brodie, M. D., also medical certificate dated February 11, 1874, signed H. C. Fessenden, M. D., show that his physical disability is permanent, and disqualifies him from following his occupation. The letters from his commanding officers—Robert Townsend, commander, United States Navy; A. Reed, United States Navy; W. W. Wood, chief engineer, United States Navy; Eben Hoyt, chief engineer, United States Navy, and others, speak in the highest terms of his qualifications, gentlemanly deportment, attention to duty, and valuable services rendered to the Government and gallantry in action; all accompanying said memorial.

The committee therefore recommend that the President of the United States be authorized to place M. H. Plunkett upon the retired list of the United States Navy, as a second assistant engineer, or the rank now corresponding to that grade; pay to begin from the passage of the act.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMY AND NAVY PENSION LAWS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the Army and Navy pension laws," approved March 3, 1873.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I make the point that this is a general bill.

The SPEAKER. It is a public bill, and is not in order under this call. It will be returned to the gentleman presenting it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. There happens this morning what does not often occur in the business of the House. The committees have been called through for reports of a private nature, and a portion of the morning hour still remains. In such a case the usage is to resume the call of committees for public business at the point where the call rests. If the House chooses to go forward with public business during the remainder of the morning hour, reports of a public nature are in order from the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, if there be no objection, I move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. We will soon run through with the business on the Private Calendar, and I should like to do that first.

The SPEAKER. That may be well, because members may be taken a little unaware in regard to it. The Chair, however, calls the attention of the House to the fact that on Friday and Saturday, in the morning hour, if the private call is finished before the expiration of the hour, the usage of the House is, although not often put in practice, but it is still the usage, the call of committees for public business continues during what remains of the morning hour, beginning where the call previously rested.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should like to ask a parliamentary question. Suppose we should get through with the private business to-day early, will not the regular order of public business then come up?

The SPEAKER. The question of privilege which the gentleman from Indiana proposes to bring up relates to a witness who refuses to obey a subpœna, and will be settled in a moment.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report for the adoption of the House the following preamble and resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas George H. Patrick, of Montgomery, Alabama, was on the 28th day of March, 1874, subpœnaed by the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House to appear before the Committee on the Judiciary to testify in the matter of the impeachment of Richard Busteed, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Alabama, and to bring with him certain papers, as appears by the return of said Sergeant-at-Arms on the subpœna; and whereas the said George H. Patrick has failed to appear before said committee, as commanded: Therefore,

Resolved, That the warrant of the Speaker of the House is hereby directed to be issued to the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, commanding said Sergeant-at-Arms to attach said George H. Patrick and bring him before the bar of the House, to answer for his contempt of said process; and said Sergeant-at-Arms shall proceed to execute such warrant forthwith.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, there will be some considerable expense attending the execution of such an order. About a week has elapsed since the party was summoned, but it does not show he refused to answer the summons. Neither the preamble nor the resolution shows there is any reason to suppose he refused to obey the subpœna. It may not be practicable for him to leave home upon a day's notice or upon a week's notice. I should like to have some evidence that this man intends to be contumacious before we go to all this trouble and expense.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I will say to the House, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on the Judiciary has been attempting to save all the expense possible in connection with this case, and the Sergeant-at-Arms has been subpœnaing witnesses by telegram. Mr. Patrick has had telegrams sent to him a number of times, and we have had assurance he would be here. Finally, failing to make his appearance, we sent a subpœna, which has been served upon him. I have the return of the Sergeant-at-Arms to the paper. He still fails to appear, and we have every reason to believe he will not appear until compelled.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am informed privately by a Representative from the State of Alabama, who is also a member of the Judiciary Committee, of the precise fact. He has made a statement to me privately which, if he will put upon the record and let it go into our debates, will settle the question.

Mr. WHITE. I stated to the gentleman from Tennessee that I know the fact this witness does refuse. The subpœna has been served and every legitimate influence has been brought to bear to induce him to come here, but he positively refuses to come.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that fact ought to appear in the preamble to the resolution.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is conclusive on that point, and I hope the preamble of the resolution will be so modified.

The SPEAKER. If that modification be made in the preamble it will go upon the record, while the statements of members upon the floor do not go upon the record.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to insert the words in the preamble that he fails and refuses to appear.

Mr. COBURN. Does the return of the Sergeant-at-Arms show that?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. It certainly does. Let the resolution be modified so it will read, "The said George T. Patrick has failed to appear and refused to appear before said committee," &c.

Mr. EAMES. I desire to inquire whether the time of service is stated?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. It is stated. It was the 28th day of March, 1874, one week ago this day.

Mr. MAYNARD. That does not matter; for, after being subpœnaed, if he refuses to appear we ought not to wait longer.

The preamble and resolution, as modified, were adopted.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to inquire of the Chair what will be the regular order after the Private Calendar shall be disposed of, if it shall be disposed of to-day before the adjournment?

The SPEAKER. If the House shall now go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, the currency bill will be in order. If the House shall go into Committee of the Whole and rise, the currency bill will then be in order.

PRINTING OF REPORT.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on War Claims three hundred copies of report No. 262 of the present session.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR LIGHTING THE HOUSE.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to offer a resolution, to which I think no one will object. I send it to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire as to the arrangements for lighting the House, and to ascertain and report to this House whether the quality of light can be improved and its cost lessened.

There was no objection, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RANK AND PAY OF ARMY MEDICAL CORPS.

Mr. EAMES, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Rhode Island Medical Society, in aid of the memorial of the American Medical Association, relating to the rank and pay of the Medical Corps of the United States Army; and moved that they be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I now insist on my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar, and pending that I ask unanimous consent, objection having been made to some bills yesterday through misapprehension, that the committee shall go back to the House bill No. 2463. Of course in committee a single objection will prevent its consideration to-day.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, was then agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, (Mr. MCNULTA in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. This is objection day, and the committee will resume the consideration of the bills on the Private Calendar, beginning the call, as instructed by the House, with the bill H. R. No. 2463.

JOSEPH S. READ.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2463) for the relief of Joseph S. Read.

The bill directs the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Joseph S. Read the sum of $395.72, the same to be received in full compensation for services of the said Joseph S. Read as an assistant door-keeper to the House of Representatives from the 1st day of August to the 10th day of November, in the year 1868.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the claim of Joseph S. Read for services as assistant door-keeper of the House of Representatives from August 1, 1868, to November 10, 1868, report:

That it appears from the statement of said Read, C. E. Lippincott, William Moore, M. C., and Edward McPherson, Clerk of the House of Representatives, that said Read was discharged as assistant door-keeper on the 25th day of July, 1868, said discharge to take effect after the adjournment of the then session of Congress; that the said Congress took a recess on the 1st day of August, and again from time to time, and finally adjourned on the 10th day of November, 1868; and that the said Read remained at the House, in the actual discharge of his duty as assistant door-keeper, until said adjournment, and has received no pay therefor from August 1, 1868, to November 10, 1868, a period of three and a half months, an account for which Edward Spicer, superintendent of the House folding-room, certifies to be correct for $395.72, at the rate of $1,440 per annum; that the reason why said account was not paid is that the money appropriated for that purpose was exhausted.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, giving to said Read the said sum of $395.72 in payment of said services.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

PETERS & REED.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 565) for the relief of Peters & Read, naval contractors at the Norfolk navy-yard, in the year 1860.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I should like to inquire why it is that this claim comes before the House? It seems to me, from the report of the committee, that——

The CHAIRMAN. This being objection day, no debate is in order.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Then I object. It is a case which should go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection, and allow the bill to be considered on its merits. If the committee will allow me, I will briefly state the nature of the bill.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I am willing that the committee should hear the gentleman from Virginia, but meanwhile reserve my right to object.

Mr. KELLEY. That is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York insist on his objection?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. All right.

J. L. TEDROW.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 955) for the relief of J. L. Tedrow, of Clarke County, Iowa. The bill authorizes the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, upon presentation of satisfactory evidence to him of the loss of postal stamps of the value of $34.50, or any less amount, by J. L. Tedrow, as postmaster at Ottawa, Clarke County, Iowa, by burglars, as alleged, to credit his account as postmaster with the amount so feloniously taken and not recovered.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

DUNCAN MARR.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2683) for the relief of Duncan Marr, a loyal citizen of Montgomery County, Tennessee.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the report which accompanies this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the report has not yet come from the printer.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. There is a report accompanying the bill. I ask that the bill be laid aside temporarily.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

S. D. HICKS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2332) for the relief of S. D. Hicks, administrator of R. M. Harvey.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to S. D. Hicks, administrator of R. M. Harvey, deceased, $355.25, the same being an amount erroneously covered into the Treasury by the error of the register of the United States district court at Richmond, Virginia.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2332) for the relief of S. D. Hicks, administrator of R. M. Harvey, beg leave to submit the following report:

In January, 1868, the United States seized a lot of manufactured tobacco, tools, &c., at the factory of Hicks & Crosby at Richmond, Virginia, for violation of the internal-revenue laws, and the same were sold by order of the United States district court for the eastern district of Virginia.

R. M. Harvey presented his petition to the court, showing that a part of the tobacco seized and sold was his property, having been stored by him in the factory of Hicks & Crosby, and it being satisfactorily proved to the court that said tobacco was not liable to seizure, the register of the court, by a decree dated June 19, 1868, was ordered to pay to R. M. Harvey $355.25, the proceeds of said tobacco thus sold. Harvey was taken sick and died, and never received the money due him under the decree, and the same was by error of the register paid into the Treasury of the United States with the balance of the money due the United States from the proceeds of this sale and an order of distribution dated May 26, 1869.

These facts are very clearly stated in a decree of said district court, dated Richmond, February 18, 1874, which makes the following order:

It is therefore adjudged, ordered, and decreed by this court that the amount hereinbefore stated, to wit, $355.25, is justly and lawfully due to the said Samuel D. Hicks, administrator, &c., of the estate of R. M. Harvey, deceased, and is chargeable as against the funds covered into the Treasury of the United States by the said decree of distribution of May 26, 1869, and ought to be paid out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, under and by virtue of the provision of the act of Congress approved July 23, 1866, section 12, United States Statute 14, page 208.

Under this decree the case was presented to the Treasury Department for payment, and payment refused by the First Comptroller on the ground that the case did not come within the law.

In view of these facts it is the opinion of your committee that the claim ought to be paid, and we therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the opinion of the First Comptroller referred to in the report may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the papers referred to in the report are not here.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill may be again reported.

The bill was again read.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

DANFORD MOTT.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2684) for the relief of Danford Mott.

The bill provides that there shall be paid to Danford Mott, of Alburgh, Vermont, the sum of $2,707.92, out of any money appropriated for the payment of judgments rendered against the United States; the same being the amount found due and allowed to the said Mott by the Court of Claims for expenses in defending a suit brought against him for acts done as an officer of the United States.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN ALDREDGE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2685) for the relief of John Aldredge.

The bill was read.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask that the report also be read.

The report was read.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I object.

RELIEF OF LOYAL CREDITORS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2686) to provide for the relief of certain loyal creditors whose moneys were confiscated by the confederate congress.

The bill was read.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I object.

SUPPLIES TAKEN DURING THE MORGAN RAID.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2687) making compensation for supplies taken by Union military forces during the Morgan raid.

The bill authorizes the commissioners of claims to receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of claims for horses, and stores or supplies, taken or furnished during the Morgan raid in July, 1863, through Indiana and Ohio, for the Union military forces, whether under command of officers of the United States, or of either of said States; and directs said commissioners to make report of said claims as of other claims.

Mr. SPEER. I move to amend as follows, by adding after Ohio, in line seven, the words, "and during the invasion by the rebels into Pennsylvania in 1862 and 1863," so that the bill will cover also the losses sustained by the people of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SPEER. I regret that, under the rules, the objection of the gentleman from Vermont prevents me at this time from saying a word in behalf of the long-suffering but gallant people of my State.

Objection having been made, the bill went over.

ALBERT F. YERBY.

The next bill on the Private Calender was the bill (H. R. No. 2688) for the relief of Albert F. Yerby, administrator of Addison O. Yerby, deceased.

The bill was read.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I object.

EMILE LAPAGE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2689) for the relief of Emile Lapage, surviving partner of the firm of Lapage Brothers.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. HALE, of New York, objected.

WILLIAM J. M'INTYRE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. (311) for the relief of William J. McIntyre.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay William J. McIntyre, late a lieutenant in the Eleventh Illinois Infantry Volunteers, the sum of $199.20, the same being the difference between the pay of a second lieutenant of infantry and a hospital steward, from the 7th day of August, 1864, to the 30th day of October, 1864.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 311) for payment for services performed by William J. McIntyre, having had the same under consideration, ask leave to report:

That the claimant, William J. McIntyre, was on the 7th day of August, 1864, commissioned by the governor of Illinois a second lieutenant in Company C, Eleventh Regiment Illinois Infantry, and immediately assumed command of his company, the captain and first lieutenant being absent, and continued in command of the company for several months thereafter.

At the time he received his commission as second lieutenant, on the 7th of August, the mustering officer of his command was absent, and very soon thereafter his command was ordered to join that of Major-General Herron at Port Hudson, and participated in the campaign that followed in Western Louisiana, the claimant commanding his company and participating in as well as leading the advance at the battles of Jackson and Clinton. It was not until the 30th day of October that an opportunity presented itself to the claimant to be mustered.

The claimant is indorsed by Hon. GEORGE C. MCKEE, of Mississippi, and Hon. William T. Jones, of Wyoming Territory, as a gentleman of the highest character, both as a soldier and a citizen.

The committee finding that the claimant not only did perform the duties of second lieutenant as alleged during the time intervening between the 7th day of August and the 30th day of October, 1864, but that he was in actual command of his company, participating in several dangerous engagements, and that his failure to be mustered was through no fault or negligence of the claimant, are of the opinion that he has a just and equitable claim against the Government, which ought to be paid, and for that purpose report back the bill (H. R. No. 311) and recommend its passage.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MARK DAVIS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2690) for the relief of Mark Davis.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I object to that bill, and I beg to say that in making the objections I do to these bills reported by the Committee on War-Claims I do not intend to make any captious opposition or to indicate my opposition to the claims; but I think that where they involve important principles they ought not to be passed without debate.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object to debate; it is in violation of the rules.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I objected to the bill, and I was only explaining my reasons for objecting.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is not necessary that the gentleman should explain his reasons; the rules do not permit it.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I object to debate by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MAYNARD. That point is well taken.

RANDALL BROWN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 633) for the relief of Randall Brown, of Nashville, Tennessee.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. GARFIELD objected.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope the committee will not rise now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope we shall go through the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

The question was taken on Mr. HARRISON'S motion; and it was disagreed to—ayes 31, noes not counted.

MRS. FLORA A. DARLING.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2691) for the relief of Mrs. Flora A. Darling.

LIEUTENANT SIDNEY TINKER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1840) for the relief of Lieutenant Sidney Tinker.

The bill was read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to that bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the report will be read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, no; I object. I do not want the report read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; that is a game that several gentlemen here can play at with great effect.

BENJAMIN W. REYNOLDS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2694) for the relief of Benjamin W. Reynolds.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I want to think of that case a little more, and therefore I object.

LIEUTENANT SIDNEY TINKER.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order, and it is that the reports accompanying bills must be read before objection is made. I call for the reading of the report accompanying the bill (H. R. No. 1840) for the relief of Lieutenant Sidney Tinker. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] objected to its reading, and I insist that the report must be read before gentlemen can be advised of the merits of the case or can object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks he was in errror in entertaining the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which cut off the reading of the report in this case. The Chair now understands the rule to be that an objection cannot be sustained until after the reading of the report if any gentleman demands its reading.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I understand that this bill was objected to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

The CHAIRMAN. The report in the case was about to be read when the gentleman from Massachusetts objected. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] still demanded the reading of the report, but the Chair held that the bill would retain its place on the Calendar under the objection made by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The Chair is now informed that the rule is to the contrary, and that a member cannot object to a bill until after the reading of the report. The Chair having been in error, now directs the report to be read.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Do I understand the Chair to decide that an objection is not in order until the bill and report have been read?

The CHAIRMAN. If the reading of the report is demanded an objection is not in order until it has been read, as the Chair now understands the rule.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the Chair direct the rule to be read by the Clerk under which he now makes his ruling?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I call for the regular order. The Chairman having made his decision, nothing is in order except the reading of the report, unless an appeal is taken from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read.

The report was read.

Mr. MAYNARD. I still object to the bill.

Objection being made, the bill went over.

GEORGE FISHER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1253) for the relief of the heirs of George Fisher.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I object to the bill.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I call for the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read.

The Clerk began to read the report, but before concluding,

Mr. MACDOUGALL moved that the further reading of the report be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I persist in my objection to the bill.

The bill accordingly went over.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 100) for the relief of Lieutenant Alonzo V. Richards, submit the following report:

The committee find that this claim was before this committee at the third session of the Forty-first Congress, and Report No. 16 of said committee at that session is full and complete, and warranted by the proof. This committee, therefore, adopt said former report as their report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there is some report accompanying this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has read the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. That refers to some other report.

The CHAIRMAN. The report recommends the passage of the bill.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

CONTRACTORS FOR BUILDING VESSELS OF WAR, ETC.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 217) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam-machinery.

The bill accordingly went over.

BUILDERS OF STEAMERS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2795) for the relief of the builders of the steamers La Portena, Edward Everett, F. W. Lincoln, Azalia, and N. P. Banks.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the builders of the steamers La Portena, Edward Everett, F. W. Lincoln, Azalia, and N. P. Banks a sum not to exceed $6,574, being the amount of revenue tax found to have been paid by them to the Government on the hulls and engines of said steamers, said payment to be made out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is an unusual claim. Let it go over. I object to the bill.

RAFAEL MADRAZO.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2796) for the relief of Rafael Madrazo.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Rafael Madrazo, owner of the bark Teresita, which vessel was illegally captured by the United States steamer Granite City on the 16th day of November, 1863, near the mouth of the Rio Grande, and restitution of which was ordered by the district court of the eastern district of Louisiana, (after sale of said bark, and the deposit of the proceeds of the sale thereof, under the order of the court in the First National Bank of New Orleans,) which said judgment of restitution was afterward at the December term, in 1866, of the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed, a sufficient sum, not exceeding $10,359.20, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to restore to Madrazo, or to his lawful assigns, without interest, the proceeds of said sale, after deducting therefrom whatever sum may have been recovered from said bank, either before or after the failure thereof, said bank having failed shortly after the deposit of the proceeds aforesaid.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I object.

JAMES W. BOWEN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1207) for the relief of James W. Bowen, late provost-marshal of the tenth congressional district of Pennsylvania.

The bill was read. It recites in the preamble that Andrew B. Neugardt, a son of Jacob Neugardt, of Upper Mahantango Township, Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, and within the tenth congressional district of said State, was drafted in the fall of the year 1864, to serve for the period of three years in the Army of the United States; that Jacob Neugardt procured Simon B. Neugardt, another of his sons, to be accepted and mustered into the service as the substitute for the said Andrew B. Neugardt; that Jacob Neugardt afterward induced his said son to desert from the Army, whereupon James W. Bowen, then the provost-marshal of said tenth congressional district, in pursuance of orders from the War Department, caused Jacob Neugardt to be arrested and detained for inducing his son to desert, and discharged him upon voluntarily depositing the sum of $625 to procure another substitute, and which substitute was procured and mustered into the service of the United States, and a certificate of discharge of Simon B. Neugardt issued and delivered to Jacob Neugardt; that Jacob Neugardt afterward repudiated the transaction, denied the deposit of the money for the purpose aforesaid, and brought suit and recovered judgment against the said James W. Bowen in the courts of Pennsylvania, and he (Bowen) was compelled to refund the sum out of his own private means. The bill therefore directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the said James W. Bowen the sum of $1,080, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, being the amount of the debt, interest, and cost due him.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1207) for the relief of James W. Bowen, late provost-marshal of the tenth congressional district of Pennsylvania, respectfully report:

It appears from the papers submitted in this case that while petitioner was acting as provost-marshal, in October, 1864, one Andrew B. Neugardt was drafted to serve in the United States Army. The drafted man procured his brother Simon to go as his substitute. The said Simon was duly mustered into the service, and was granted a furlough of ten days before joining his regiment. The said Simon failed to make his appearance at the expiration of his furlough, and was marked as a deserter on the rolls. The petitioner caused Jacob Neugardt, the father of said Simon, to be arrested on the charge of aiding and abetting the desertion, and detained him in the guard-house for one or two days. While thus under arrest Jacob Neugardt paid petitioner $625 to procure a substitute for Simon. The said Jacob afterward brought suit in the court of common pleas in the tenth district of Pennsylvania against petitioner for the sum so paid under duress, and recovered judgment for $800 and costs. As it is presumed all the facts in the transaction were before the court on the trial of the case, and that defendant had a fair trial on the law and the facts, your committee fail to see any reason why the judgment and costs should be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

The committee therefore report back the bill, with the recommendation that the same do lie on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is a very satisfactory report.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be reported adversely to the House.

WILLIAM PELHAM.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1370) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to settle and pay the accounts of William Pelham, late surveyor-general of New Mexico.

The bill was read. It requires the Secretary of the Interior to settle and pay whatever amount may be found due and owing by the Government to William Pelham, as surveyor-general of the Territory; and appropriates for that purpose $518.90, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2797) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of March 3, 1871.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is a general bill, in relation to the report of the commissioners of southern claims. It is very voluminous, and I suppose it is hardly necessary to read the bill if any gentleman proposes to object to it.

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina. I object.

B. C. BAILEY.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 488) for the relief of B. C. Bailey.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. HALE, of New York, objected.

JOHN J. HAYDEN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2798) for the relief of John J. Hayden.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John J. Hayden $150 in full compensation for services rendered by him for the United States, in the year 1864, in the office of John H. Farquhar, Captain in the Nineteenth Regiment United States Infantry and mustering and disbursing officer at Indianapolis, Indiana, in relation to the draft accounts of said State.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War-Claims, to whom was referred the petition and papers of John J. Hayden, asking compensation for services rendered by him to the United States in 1864, beg leave to report:

That it appears from the papers before the committee that Mr. Hayden was employed in January and February, 1864, by Hon. John H. Farquhar, late a member of the House of Representatives, and in 1864 captain in the Nineteenth United States Infantry, and mustering and disbursing officer, Indiana, to make up certain abstracts of draft accounts for Indiana, and preparing a book of twenty-seven hundred checks ready for the signature of the disbursing officer. Colonel Farquhar states that this service occupied the time of Mr. Hayden for thirty nights; that the entire service was rendered after office hours; that it was important for the public service that Mr. Hayden should perform this duty, as he was especially qualified for the same. Colonel Farquhar's certificate is as follows:

The United States to J. J. Hayden, Dr.

January, February, 1864. For services rendered Captain J. H. Farquhar, Nineteenth United States Infantry, mustering and disbursing officer, Indianapolis, Indiana, for thirty nights' services, after all other work of the day was finished in provost-marshal-general's office, in making up abstracts of draft accounts for Indiana for 1862, and preparing a book of twenty-seven hundred checks ready for his signature in payment of said accounts—30 nights, at $5 per night, $150.

The duty in the provost-marshal's office was entirely independent, and in all cases that duty was fully completed for each day and evening before the above work was prosecuted.

I certify that the above account is correct and just; that the services were rendered as stated; and that they were necessary for the public service. Judge Hayden was familiar with, and associated in, the work of the draft commissioner in 1862, and devoted night hours to the above work, entirely independent of the demands of other duty, to enable me to complete the work devolved upon me.

JOHN H. FARQUHAR,
Late Captain Nineteenth United States Infantry,
Mustering and Disbursing Officer, Indiana.

Received, &c.

J. J. HAYDEN.

Mr. Hayden was a clerk in the office of the provost-marshal-general of Indiana.

Your committee would not deem it proper in a time of peace to permit a public officer to receive extra compensation for official services, but as this service was rendered under the pressure of urgent public necessity, and outside of office hours, and in a different employment from that in which Mr. Hayden was engaged, and under special employment of Colonel Farquhar, and was of special public value, as stated by Colonel Farquhar in a letter now before the committee, dated January 19, 1869, your committee think this claim is an unexceptional and meritorious one, and should be allowed, and are of the opinion that such allowance cannot give rise to any questionable precedent. Colonel Farquhar says, in the letter referred to, "Judge Hayden was under no obligation to perform the service, and undertook it at my earnest solicitation, with confident expectation of extra pay, and a desire to serve the Government. I know that his services were indispensable, and that the amount charged is reasonable and should be paid."

Under these circumstances your committee report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM ROOD.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1220) for the relief of William Rood, late private of the Thirty-sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers.

The bill directs the Adjutant-General of the Army to remove the charge of desertion from the name of William Rood, late private Company E, Thirty-sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers, in view of his death while in service; and that the father of the said William Rood shall be allowed and paid the back pay, bounty, and additional bounty, act of the 28th of July, 1866, due him, in the same manner and to the same extent as if the said charge of desertion had never been made, and application therefor had been filed before the 30th of January, 1873.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill, with an amendment, to strike out the words "back pay, bounty, and additional bounty, act of 28th of July," and to insert in lieu thereof, the words "pay and benefits and advantages."

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

DAVID W. STOCKSTILL.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2799) for the relief of David W. Stockstill, of Sidney, Ohio.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to offer an amendment to make that bill conform with the practice of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I submit that that is in the nature of debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana objects.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object, but it is certainly in order to move an amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is in the nature of debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I shall have to object.

BENJAMIN CRAWFORD.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2800) for the relief of Benjamin Crawford.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Benjamin Crawford the sum of $5,000, which shall be in full compensation for the use by the Government of the said Crawford's patent steam-blower.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe we have now passed over all the bills upon the Calendar, and I ask that the bill (H. R. No. 1840) for the relief of Lieutenant Sidney Tinker be reported to the House. That bill was objected to before the report was read, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and subsequently by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] who afterward withdrew his objection. I now ask that by unanimous consent it be laid aside, to be reported to the House favorably.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCNULTA reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had the Private Calendar under consideration, and had directed him to report sundry bills, some with and some without amendments.

JAMES W. BOWEN.

A bill (H. R. No. 1207) for the relief of James W. Bowen was reported from the Committee of the Whole adversely.

The bill was laid on the table.

LIEUTENANT SIDNEY TINKER.

Mr. HOLMAN. Unanimous consent was given by the committee that the bill (H. R. No. 1840) for the relief of Lieutenant Sidney Tinker should be reported to the House favorably.

The SPEAKER. The clerks inform the Chair that the Chairman of the committee did not recognize that as the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. It certainly was so understood; it was the last thing done in committee.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

No objection was made; and the bill was brought before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend that bill by adding the words "deducting any sum paid to him as a private or non-commissioned officer for said period."

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. SCOFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved, That Rules 128 and 129 be amended in the first line of each by striking out the words "and Saturday."

PRINTING OF REPORTS IN RECORD.

Mr. BURCHARD. I would like to inquire of the Chair if there is any necessity for printing in full in the RECORD all the reports that are made by committees in connection with bills which have been considered by them, especially the bills which have been reported from the Committee of the Whole to-day?

The SPEAKER. The practice is to print them only when they are read, being called for in explanation of pending bills.

Mr. BURCHARD. It seems to me an abstract would be sufficient.

Mr. SPEER. Is it the habit also to print the reports which have already been printed in connection with Senate bills?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, where they are read in the House. That practice might be corrected by a resolution of the Committee on Printing.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I desire to offer a resolution for reference.

Mr. KELLEY. That resolution will be in order on Monday.

Mr. COX. I may not get the floor on Monday.

Mr. KELLEY. The resolution of the gentleman can live until Monday morning.

Mr. COX. I am not so certain the gentleman will live, if he does not get a chance to make his speech.

CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

The SPEAKER. The House will resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1572) reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to express, and I shall be grateful to the House if it will give me its ear while I do express, the reasons why I cannot support the bill No. 1572, reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency, and why at the proper time I shall move to substitute for consideration before the Committee of the Whole bill No. 539, presented by myself, and which I find by conversation with members is generally known as the three sixty-five interchangeable-bond bill.

I regard the bill of the committee as fraught with danger to the country and the revenues of the Government. The title, in so far as it speaks of proposing to establish free banking, is delusive. I am in favor of free banking, and therefore must oppose this bill, which proposes in terms, but under conditions that are almost impossible of fulfillment, the extension of the monopoly banking system which has become so odious to the country. It proposes to extend the provisions of existing laws, requiring whomsoever will organize a bank to deposit Government bonds in excess of the amount of currency to be received, as security for the redemption of the notes received. In this connection let me suggest that the bill would be well entitled were it called "A bill to increase the value of the estates of certain citizens of the United States and other countries by enhancing the market price of United States bonds and promoting speculation therein." This would be the inevitable effect of its passage. I cannot imagine the circumstances that would justify Congress in subjecting itself to the animadversion such action would invite. But there is nothing to justify it, as the deposit of bonds as security for our circulating medium is not essential to banking, and is at war with and an obstruction in the way of the establishment of free banking.

What is banking? It is the borrowing and lending of credit; or, in other words, of purchasing power, and involves the use of but little money, whether of gold or paper. If gentlemen desire demonstration of these facts, I refer them to the remarks made the other day by the amiable and witty gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS,] to Bagehot's Lombard Street and to Bonamy Price's recent works, and essays in the British magazines and reviews. One per cent. of what Professor Price calls money, or gold as distinguished from bank notes, nay, ½ of 1 per cent., he tells us, serves for the banking of all London; and 3 per cent., ½ per cent. being in gold and the other 2½ per cent. in "cash" or bank notes, is all the money that is now required to carry on the enormous banking system and trade of London.

As I have said, banking is the borrowing and lending of credit, of purchasing power, and I will detain you but for a passing illustration of the fact. If I have a thousand-dollar draft at my disposal, I send it to my bank in Philadelphia; and if I owe two sums of $500 each, I send checks for that amount to my creditors; and the chances are that the whole will be adjusted without the use of one penny of money. The draft will go to one institution, and the checks to two individuals, each of whom will deposit his check in his bank, and the three will meet and be exchanged in the clearing-house the next morning. I have named but a small sum, because I am not in the habit of handling much larger ones. But what is true of my poor $1,000 is equally true of operations involving tens of thousands or hundreds of thousands of dollars. In the clearing-houses of London and New York balances of hundreds of millions are settled daily without the use of money.

Having shown that money in great sums is not essential to banking, I proceed to add that the power to issue money does not inhere in banking; that this power constitutes no part of a just system of banking, but is dangerous to both the public and the banks that exercise it.

No system of banking in this country or in any other, in this age or in any preceding age, that involved the issue by the banks of paper, promising to pay gold or silver on demand, ever went through its career without insolvency; they have all involved ruin to the banks, loss to the note-holders, and general derangement of the industries and trade of the country. How government interposition has saved the banks of England and France I may show hereafter. The only banking systems that have maintained the integrity of their issues have been those which avoided the gold-basis theory and discarded the use of bullion as a security for the redemption of notes. They have been very few. Let me name them. The free-banking system, as it was called, of New York, under which bonds of the United States and of the State of New York were deposited to secure the notes. The next is the Bank of England, which, as we are assured by John E. Williams, an eminent banker of New York, in an interesting article in a recent number of Old and New, borrowed this salutary principle from the New York system. It may have $70,000,000 of notes afloat, which are secured by the deposit of £14,000,000 sterling of Government securities, and its notes have been interchangeable with money since 1844, with three brief intervals, when the system of promising gold redemption and of issuing notes based on gold deposits in excess of the £14,000,000 brought about crises, and the government intervened, and by order in council set aside the restrictions of the law and appealed to Parliament, then in session or when it assembled, to legalize the violation of law. The partial departure from the true basis has thus brought the bank to the verge of insolvency three times since 1844. The Bank of France has also been saved several times by the like interposition of the government, which relieved it from embarrassment by declaring its notes a legal tender, as they are at this time.

This was the process by which Thiers saved the bank, animated the industries, and increased the productive and taxable power of the people, and enabled conquered France to anticipate the date at which the enormous indemnity exacted by Germany was required to be paid. In adopting it he was not governed by speculative theory, but by the results of experience. The republic of 1848 found itself without revenue and the people without employment, and declared the notes of the bank to be legal tender.

Commenting on this act, the London Times, planting itself upon the doctrines of Hume, Ricardo, McCullough, Bastiat, and other bullionists, denounced it as the most disastrous incident of the revolution. But what was the result? The Times itself shall answer this question. On the 16th of February, 1849, within one year from the date of the article I have referred to, it said:

> As a mere commercial speculation, with the assets which the bank held in its hands, it might then have stopped payment and liquidated its affairs with every probability that a very few weeks would enable it to clear off all its liabilities. But this idea was not for a moment entertained by M. D'Argout, and he resolved to make every effort to keep alive what may be termed the circulation of the life-blood of the community. The task was overwhelming. Money was to be found to meet not only the demands on the bank, but the necessities, both public and private, of every rank in society. It was essential to enable the manufacturers to work, lest their workmen, driven to desperation, should fling themselves among the most violent enemies of public order. It was essential to provide money for the food of Paris, for the pay of the troops, and for the daily support of the ateliers nationaux. A failure on any one point would have led to a fresh convulsion. But the panic had been followed by so great a scarcity of the metallic currency, that a few days later, out of a payment of 26,000,000 fallen due, only 47,000 francs could be recovered in silver.
> In this extremity, when the bank alone retained any available sums of money the government came to the rescue, and, on the night of the 15th of March, the notes of the bank were by a decree made legal tender, the issue of these notes being limited in all to three hundred and fifty millions, but the amount of the lowest of them reduced for the public convenience to one hundred francs. One of the great difficulties mentioned in the report was to print these one hundred franc notes fast enough for the public consumption; in ten days the amount issued in this form had reached eighty millions. No sooner was the bank relieved from the necessity of paying away the remnant of its coin, than it made every exertion to increase its metallic rest. About forty millions of silver were purchased abroad at a high price. More than one hundred millions were made over in dollars to the treasury and executive departments in Paris. In all, taking into account the branch banks, five hundred and six millions of five-franc pieces have been thrown by the bank into the country since March, and her currency was thus supplied to all the channels of the social system.
> Besides the strictly monetary operations, the Bank of France found means to furnish a series of loans to the government—fifty millions on exchequer bills on the 31st of March, thirty millions on the 5th of May, and on the 3d of June one hundred and fifty millions, to be paid up before the end of March, 1849; of this last sum only one third has yet been required by the state. The bank also took a part in the renewed loan of two hundred and fifty millions, and made vast advances to the city of Paris, to Marseilles, to the department of the Seine, and to the hospital, amounting in all to two hundred and sixty millions more. But even this was not all. To enable the manufacturing interests to weather the storm, at a moment when all the sales were interrupted, a decree of the National Assembly had directed warehouses to be opened for the reception of all kinds of goods, and provided that the registered invoice of these goods, so deposited, should be made negotiable by indorsement. The Bank of France discounted these receipts. In Havre alone, eighteen millions were thus advanced on colonial produce, and in Paris fourteen millions on merchandise—in all, sixty millions were thus made available for the purpose of trade. Thus, the great institution had placed itself, as it were, in direct contact with every interest of the community, from the minister of the treasury down to the trader in a distant outport. Like a huge hydraulic machine, it employed its colossal powers to pump a fresh stream into the exhausted arteries of trade, to sustain credit and preserve the circulation from complete collapse.

But to return from this instructive digression. The other case referred to is that of the United States. We were not taught by experience, but forced by that higher law, necessity, to issue notes based on the credit of the Government, pledged to no other form of redemption than their reception in payment of taxes and by making them a legal tender in payment of debts for all objects except—and the exception was an almost fatal error—for all obligations except duties on imports and interest on the public debt. The volume of currency of this character was supplemented by permitting certain banks to issue a limited volume of currency, on condition that they should lend their capital to the Government at 6 per cent. and deposit the bonds received therefor as security for the redemption of the notes the Government would prepare and permit them to issue.

Who ever lost a dollar by the note of one of the New York free banks? Who has lost a pound by the notes of the Bank of England, which are secured by the deposit of public securities? Who has lost a dollar by the failure of the United States Treasury note or a national-bank note thus secured to buy him a dollar's worth of wine, or wheat, or wool, or any other American production? No man; and I challenge all history for a parallel to any one of these, where the banks promised to redeem their notes in specie.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does not every man to-day who takes a dollar of greenbacks or national banking currency take in the neighborhood of 12½ per cent. less than one dollar in bonds, another promise of the United States?

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have very brief notes from which to speak; and I propose to make my own speech, and not to discuss topics propounded by other gentlemen. I will listen attentively to the gentleman from Wisconsin when he gets the floor, and hear whatever he may have to suggest upon the question he has suggested. Should he then do me the honor to interrogate me, I will find pleasure in replying.

No, sir; there has been no parallel case, but on the contrary when our banks failed and refused to return the funds of their depositors, and when with the finest satire of all history they issued certificates of deposit and said they did it to prevent a further emission of irredeemable paper our paper issues retained their value. While proclaiming themselves bankrupt and unable to pay the checks of depositors, they issued certificates pledging the combined credit and assets of all the banks in the city of New York for the patriotic purpose of preventing a further emission of irredeemable paper. Could self-sacrifice have gone further than this? Now, sir, in three days from the issue of the first of these certificates it took $105 in a certificate backed by all the banks of New York to buy $100 in greenbacks or secured bank-notes; and it was months before depositors upon whose deposits these certificates received credit could get the notes of the very banks which held their deposits by any other means than by going to broker-shops and selling the depreciated substitute for irredeemable paper which the combined banks had created. Was there ever such heartless irony or such supreme impudence? Or could the correctness of my position be more clearly proven?

The bill is in its terms delusive, not only in promising free banking, but in promising to increase the volume of circulation by making it free. Sir, on the 12th of July, 1870—I would like the then chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. GARFIELD] to hear—on the 12th of July, 1870, this House forced through a bill, as to which I know not whether it was most of a blunder or most of a crime, or whether it was both blunder and crime.

There was at that time on deposit with the Government about $55,000,000, deposited by the American people, in the form of a temporary loan, at 3 per cent. interest.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman be kind enough to point out what it was in the bill referred to which he regards as a "blunder" or a "crime?"

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed I shall be specific enough. I have it in my mind to run pretty directly to some ends. When we began the discussion of that bill we had somewhere from fifty-five to seventy million dollars, as my memory serves me, of 3 per cent. temporary loans. The American people were content to have 3 per cent. interest, with the certainty that when there came tight times in the money market they could carry their 3 per cent. certificates, which, being overdue, were payable on call, to the Treasurer or nearest assistant treasurer, and get greenbacks for them. That loan was the balance-wheel of our whole system of inconvertible paper money. So long as those millions of temporary loans lay there, greenbacks could not be locked up by speculators, a crisis could not be brought about; for there were $55,000,000 held by the Treasury, belonging to business men, which was payable on call in greenbacks; and it was the use and wont of the holders, when a tight money market came, to get their temporary-loan certificates exchanged by the Government.

Mr. BURCHARD. If I do not interrupt the gentleman, I would like to ask him what time he refers to.

Mr. KELLEY. I refer to the bill which was passed on the 12th of July, 1870. The gentleman will oblige me if he will defer any further questions till I shall have closed, when I will be glad to hear him.

The bill is, Mr. Speaker, as I was showing, delusive in promising an increase of the currency of the country. We withdrew the three per cents; we forced their surrender under the lead of the then chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, on the theory that the volume of currency was to be maintained without contraction. Pending the discussion of that bill, and after its suggestion, a large amount of these three per cents came in. The total amount outstanding, when we came to act on the bill finally, was $54,000,000; and it was provided that $54,000,000 national-bank notes should be issued in lieu of the $54,000,000 of three per cents to be called in. Gentlemen on the floor said it was to work a contraction. Men who saw the terrible influence of contraction upon the debtor class and the enterprise of the country warned the House against even that measure of contraction; but the answer of the eloquent gentleman from Ohio was, it does not mean contraction.

Now, what was the result? The three per cents were called in immediately and paid off. What, I am asked, were they paid in? They were paid by leaving that amount of 6 per cent. gold-bearing bonds, which ought to have been called home and redeemed, remain in foreign markets, and we made the marvelous economy of borrowing $54,000,000 of foreigners at 6 per cent. in gold as a substitute for that amount held by our own people at 3 per cent.

How about the $54,000,000 of bank currency going out to substitute the three per cents which had been counted in the reserve as greenbacks? Have they all been issued yet? No. They have come out slowly, at distant intervals—part of them have. Forty-nine million some hundred thousand have been issued, and the Comptroller of the Currency has this day informed me that there are still $4,390,693 of that $54,000,000 to be issued.

Now, I tell gentlemen that if they pass this free-banking bill, as it is called, they will have the same result again. The South and West are in no condition to buy bonds on a speculative market, such as they will have on the passage of this bill. They are in no better condition now to institute banks based on gold-bearing bonds than they have been in the intervening four years. If banks be established under this bill in the South and West, it will be done by capitalists and capital from east of the Hudson River. They may bear the name of a southern or western town or city, but they will be only a new facility granted to bankers and speculators residing east of the Hudson, where capital has accumulated to take new mortgages, not only upon current productions, but upon the farms and plantations of the West and South. They will give those sections currency shops; they will be of advantage to the people so far as they will make places in which they may deposit their money and thus increase commercial capital, but they will represent an absenteeism as fatal to local enterprise and the prosperity of those sections as English landlordism of Ireland has been to the prosperity of that unhappy island.

Is free banking possible? I have heard it said it is not. I think it is, sir. In the first place, let me say that the emission of money is an attribute of sovereignty, an attribute which cannot safely be delegated, which never should be delegated, and which the most enlightened opinion of Great Britain is now demanding shall be resumed by the British government for the benefit of the British people. I could cite many authorities on this subject, but I propose to refer simply to the closing paragraph of a paper entitled "The mint and the Bank of England," in the Westminster Review for October last. It says:

> In breaking this monopoly of the bank we should be taking a great stride toward the attainment of that ideal system of currency which Sir Robert Peel must have had in his heart when he passed his currency laws; a system under which the state shall be the sole fountain of issue, under which no money shall circulate on credit, or, if it does, shall circulate on the credit of the state, all bank-notes, as well as coins, bearing the image and superscription of the head of the state, and under which all profits upon the issue of money shall form part of the imperial revenue.
> The power of issue is, and ought to be, a sovereign right. It was a sovereign right in the days of Athelstan, and as a sovereign right was exercised only by the king. It will be recognized as a sovereign right to be exercised only by the king in the days of Albert VI. But at our present rate of suppressing private coinage, the issue of bank notes, it will not be till the days of Albert VI, and it has not been since the days of Athelstan. The power of issue now exercised by the Bank of England, and by the English, Irish, and Scotch banks, is a relic of feudalism, and of those rough and rude times when every prelate and noble set up a mint under the shadow of his palace or castle, coined money in their own names as grantees of the king, and appropriated the profit of their mints as they appropriated the rent of their estates. The manufacture of coin has been suppressed long ago, but the manufacture of paper money still remains, and the profits of this manufacture are allowed to remain in private hands, the state taking upon itself the manufacture of the only part of the currency upon which there is or can be a loss. It is high time that this state of things ceased; that all rights of issue were gathered into the hands of the state; that the debt of the Bank of England was paid off; that all notes except those of the state were suppressed; that the powers of issue now exercised by the banks were vested in the hands of the royal mint: that gold coinage, like silver and copper, was made self-supporting, and that the profits upon paper currency were claimed by the state, and appropriated, like the profits of the post-office, to the reduction of taxation.

I have said that the power to emit money cannot be delegated without danger to the Government and the people, and especially to the current trade and commerce of the country. It involves the highest attribute of sovereignty, and cannot be parceled out among the people of the several States without such collisions of interest and opinion as must perpetually endanger trade and commerce. And, sir, I maintain the position that paper money emitted by the Government should be based on the credit of the Government, which rests on the taxable property and power of the country; that Government issues promising to pay specie, or any other mode of redemption than by their receipt in payment of taxes and all other pecuniary liabilities to the Government, would be fraught with the same delusive snare that bank promises to do an impossible thing are fraught with.

I know, sir, that this statement will envelop me with the tender emotion of pity, nigh akin to love, of the eloquent gentleman from the Hartford district of Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] of my eloquent friend from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS,] and, it may be, of my good friend from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD,] and the learned bullionists of the country generally. I should undoubtedly be overwhelmed by the consciousness of their loving condescension and pity were I not something of an egotist, and in the habit of thinking my own opinions just as good as those of other men, especially when I stand on a proposition taught me, and supported more ably than I can support it, by Benjamin Franklin, John Jay, (when presiding over the Continental Congress,) Thomas Jefferson, Alexander Hamilton, John Taylor of Caroline, James Madison, and John C. Calhoun, among the dead, and by Henry C. Carey, John A. Thomson of Summit Point, West Virginia, and Charles Sears, of Navasink, New Jersey, three as original and profound thinkers as God ever blessed our country with, and with a legion of men less worthy of distinction than they, but scarcely less worthy of it than my associates on this floor who do me the honor to pity my ignorance and credulity.

But let me say, and it would be well for the country to consider the proposition, that all talk of the resumption of specie payments at this time is a delusion, without a shadow of foundation in fact or theory sustained by fact; and they who not being bankers or of the creditor class who urge resumption are misled by the teachings of men who proclaim their science to be a science based on assumptions. This is like the oriental theory by which the earth is kept in its place; the earth it is assumed rests on an elephant; it is assumed the elephant rests on a tortoise, and the tortoise is assumed to rest on something; and if one of these assumptions is wrong, the possibility is that the theory is not exactly right. And so is it with this science based on assumptions; when assumptions are consistent with the facts of history and social life, we may prove the deductions from them. Let me illustrate one generally accepted assumption, before proceeding to another point.

This school of philosophers tell us that by an unyielding law the volume of currency regulates the prices of commodities, and that gold is the standard of prices, the measure of value. Now I find by reference to page 39 of a work published by Hon. W. A. Richardson, Secretary of the Treasury, entitled "Public debt and national banking laws of the United States," that—

> The amount of currency in actual circulation, including demand notes, reached its highest point about August 31, 1865, when it was $433,160,569. At the time of the proclamation of the President, April 2, 1866, declaring the rebellion ended in certain States therein named, it was $422,749,252. It was first reduced below $400,000,000 September 1, 1866, near the time of the President's proclamation of August 20, 1866, declaring the insurrection at an end throughout the whole of the United States, when it was $399,663,592, and has never been so high since that date.

This work was published in 1873, prior to the financial crash which occurred in September.

Now, sir, let us look at the irrefutable assumption which is dinned into our ears daily by the scholars of the House with such pitying condescension toward their unfortunate associates who have not been able to find evidence to sustain it.

According to these learned teachers and Mr. Secretary Richardson's facts we have a pyramid, starting from its base on the 1st of January, 1864, going to its climax on the 31st of August, 1865, and descending steadily but less rapidly to January, 1867. If their theory is true, that pyramidal form is an inevitable result. What I have to say on the subject is, that if that is the law we have been living in flagrant violation of it, for which we deserve the most condign punishment. But, sir, what are the facts of the case? They show that the pyramid was reversed, and that in August, 1865, the price of gold was lower than it had been in 1864, and than it was in 1866. I state the facts correctly, and if you will do me the honor to refer to my remarks when they shall appear in the RECORD, you will find a table prepared from the Bankers' Almanac of New York, which gives the price of gold every day, during the months of June, July, August, September, and October, for the three years of 1864, 1865, and 1866. The facts presented by this exhibit demolish these particular assumptions and repeal all laws which a priori reasoning has deduced therefrom.

Exhibit showing premium on gold at New York during the months of June, July, August, September, and October, for the years 1864, 1865, and 1866.

Now, I insist that if we lived through those three years in such flagrant violation of known laws there ought to be some means of punishing us for it, and that the men who bought their goods so cheaply in 1865, when currency was so abundant, ought, by some equitable process, to be made to pay more, because this law required them to pay nearly twice as much in that year as they did in 1864, and considerably more than they did in 1866. What have the adherents of this supposed law, who have addressed us so touchingly on the moral aspect of the currency question, to say on this aspect of the case? I hope they will give us their views.

But it may be said that the war interfered with the operation of the law. If so, I reply by asking a question or two. Was not the war more remote from 1866 than it was from August, 1865; and pray what kept up the price of gold in 1866, when the work of contraction was going on so vigorously under the action of an enlightened Congress and Secretary of the Treasury? I know that well-read gentlemen will say these facts are very vulgar, and I admit it, but must also claim that they have much force.

Sir, I repeat, that all talk of the resumption of specie payments under the existing condition of affairs is idle, and state, as my next proposition, that bond resumption must precede note resumption. Let us look at this. Come, let us reason together as brethren. Is the question of immediate or early resumption a practical one? We owe on our gold-bearing bonds, in round numbers, $100,000,000—$99,000,000 and a little more. We owe on State and municipal and corporate bonds enough to increase the total largely and make the sum payable abroad in round terms about $100,000,000 annually. This is payable at various periods during the year, the Government interest is payable quarterly or semi-annually, but the date of the semi-annual payments is so arranged that the falling due of installments of interest may be regarded as quarterly. Seventy-three per cent. of our carrying trade of last year was done in foreign bottoms, and the balance of trade was against us well-nigh $100,000,000. Our people are much given to foreign travel, and many thousands of them reside abroad. In the little city of Dresden the last census found more than two thousand American residents; in Paris there is a much larger colony; and they are found in all the attractive cities of the Continent. It is estimated that the outlay by European travelers and residents is $60,000,000 a year. Take into account $100,000,000 of gold interest; take the balance of trade, a part of which is profit made by us, but a larger part of it is not profit, but results from the excessive importation through the resident agents of German, French, English, and other foreign manufacturers who put their old stocks on our market by auction at any price. I cannot make an accurate estimate of the carrying trade, and I throw off $30,000,000 of the estimated $60,000,000 for American travel and residence abroad, and that leaves a total of something over $180,000,000 a year to be paid to foreign countries in bullion or commodities. The fact that justifies the reduction of this estimate to the amount stated is the receipt of bullion in the hands of immigrants, of which no account can be taken by statisticians. But for this the annual balance against us would be largely over $200,000,000.

I pause here, and regret that my friend from the Hartford district of Connecticut is not here. I am very glad, however, that my friend from the Milwaukee district of Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL] is not here. You will remember the enthusiasm with which my friend from Connecticut shouted over the new discovery in political economy made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, the enthusiasm, expressed by gesticulation and emphasis of every kind, with which he hailed and proclaimed that new discovery in political science—so important did he regard it that he would fain have everybody know that it had been made and appreciate its value. "I will" exclaimed he, "quote his demonstration, lest some now listening may not have heard it." The demonstration was, that if a vessel sailed from an American port with $100,000 worth of goods on board, and went down in mid-ocean, there was no balance of trade against us, but it showed a favorable balance of exports. Well, sir, the demonstration was, I doubt not, really an invention of my friend from Wisconsin, and he deserves credit for originality; but I am sorry to say it was among the earlier things that Bastiat taught me, and I regarded it with almost as much favor as the gentleman from Connecticut did until, on investigating the history of Bastiat's works, I found that British writers, when they were less given to free trade than they are now, had suggested to Bastiat that he would do well, in other editions of his works, to leave out this Joe Millerism, as it was a very venerable suggestion, and had long been known under that title to the English people. The idea of resting the science of political economy on the occurrence of accidents, and the assumption that such accidents do not happen under general laws and in equal proportions to all commercial nations, that no storm shall sweep from the ocean any ship that does not bear the flag of a particular country, while the fleets of other nations move safely through storms and tempests, is a Joe Millerism in political economy to the authorship of which few thoughtful persons would aspire.

Sir, there is an average liability to accidents among commercial nations, and a solid basis for scientific consideration of the laws involved in the settlement of the balance of trade remains, notwithstanding the sanction of the authority of Joe Miller, Bastiat and my friends from Wisconsin and Connecticut.

But the gentleman from Wisconsin, with more ingenuity than candor, proceeded to say:

> Of the same character with the balance of trade bugbear is that sometimes urged, to the effect that we can never return to a specie standard so long as we have so much interest to pay abroad. That objection is based on the exploded idea that we cannot pay our interest abroad in anything but specie, as if our wheat and corn, our cotton and petroleum, our pork and lumber, will not give us a credit balance in London just as readily as the gold of California.

This discovery is more ingenious than the other, and brings me to a point worthy of consideration by gentlemen about to legislate on banking and currency. I had the folly, when we were discussing the bill which became the act of July 12, 1870, to suggest that we were blessed in the fact that our currency was inexportable; and I now reaffirm the doctrine that our commercial salvation depends upon the fact that our currency is inexportable, although the distinguished gentleman from Ohio then the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. GARFIELD] was so immensely surprised at my innocence that, forgetting that money is a creature of law, that it represents the sovereignty of the state by which it is emitted, that it is legal tender and can pay all a man's debts within the limits of the sovereignty by which it is emitted, he supposed it to be strictly analogous to eggs and butter and cheese; and learnedly said that we had addled eggs and moldy cheese, and odorous butter, and divers other things that were not exportable, and wanted to know whether I thought our country blessed in the fact that they were inexportable. Sir, when were addled eggs made a legal tender? What law of the United States ever made musty cheese a legal tender? When was the sovereignty of this nation stamped on musty flour, or moldy cheese, or addled eggs? It was a pleasant witticism, but it was slightly wanting in strict analogy, inasmuch as different effects ensue from the export of surplus commodities and of part of the life-blood of commerce—the legal-tender currency of a country, when that currency is not in excess of the legitimate demands of trade.

Now, sir, I come back to my argument. We owe abroad about $180,000,000 annually. Where do we get the gold with which to pay this annual charge? We mine about $60,000,000, and we import from nations that become debtors to us in the course of trade, and have gold to spare about $20,000,000, making about $80,000,000. How do we settle the rest? By virtue of our inexportable currency we settle the rest, to use the language of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. MITCHELL,] in our wheat and corn, our cotton and petroleum, our pork and lumber, and our gold from California. Foreigners, not being able to use our legal-tender currency in other lands leave our business to flow on undisturbed in its accustomed channels, and take their balances in the products of our soil, our mines, our fisheries, and workshops. And here is the point of my argument in favor of a currency that shall be of like value in every man's hands wherever the American flag floats as an emblem of sovereignty, and yet shall lose its money value when it leaves the limits of our country, and shall therefore serve us with a constancy that a gold currency which our creditors covet would not be permitted to.

Let us see what would probably be the effect of hastening by artificial means to the use of a convertible currency. I will not stop to discuss the method by which that end shall be attained, but will assume that it is possible that we may reach it, and will only discuss the probability of maintaining the position when we shall have reached it. We have $180,000,000 in gold annually to settle abroad, which our creditors now very gladly take in commodities. We resume specie payments; and the Treasury begins to redeem greenbacks and the banks begin to redeem national-bank notes. All might go on swimmingly for a month or six weeks, or a few months, when Germany might draw on France for gold, unexpectedly to France, or France draw on Germany, or both draw on England, or England draw on both. They are all creditors to us. There being a crisis such as recently happened at Berlin the other day, or as is now happening in London, and as is imminent in France; and, finding their specie drawn away from them they would avail themselves of the ocean cable, and telegraph their agents in this country and say, "Sell $5,000,000 of bonds, merchandise, or anything, and remit the specie."

Under these circumstances orders such as I have supposed would not come from a single banker or merchant, but from dozens or scores of them. Our stock of gold coin would be the bank on which their crisis would cause a run; greenbacks would be sent to the Treasury, and national-bank notes would be presented to the banks for redemption. Both might sustain the first shock; but when steamer day came and it should be announced that one steamer had taken out two millions of specie, another $1,500,000, and another two millions more, merchants would probably say to themselves, "If our gold is all to go abroad we must, though it may cause a suspension, take care of ourselves;" and a run on the banks and the Treasury would ensue, and both would be compelled to suspend specie payment in the midst of a financial crisis.

I pray gentlemen to note that I make a distinction between gold and currency. I have no objection to our gold going abroad. It is mined by American labor; it is wealth drawn from our mines; and is a commodity as much as iron, lead, copper, petroleum, tobacco, cotton, or wheat. It is one of the productions of our soil, gathered by the labor of the American people; and let it go as freely as any other commodity. But do not make it part of our currency just now; do not make every note, whether greenback or bank note, redeemable in it, until we shall have redeemed or converted half of our gold-bearing bonds and so far restored our commercial marine that we shall have a profit and not a charge in account with the carrying trade and our foreign exchanges.

But, say gentlemen, how can we redeem or convert our bonds? Appeal to and trust the American people and you can redeem your obstructive gold-bearing bonds with a rapidity that will be magical. Rely on the American people as England in her exigencies relies on her people; as France relies on hers, and as the German Empire trusts the people of that empire.

Appeal to and trust the American people again! In the name of God and humanity I appeal to you to lift the laboring masses of our people from their idleness and deep dejection by trusting them again, as you did during the days of the war, when from the results of their labor they loaned the Government $2,000,000,000 on various forms of temporary loan; on 3 per cent. certificates, on seven-thirties redeemable in three years, on compound-interest notes, a legal tender for the face value but not for accrued interest, on certificates of indebtedness, on certificates of deposit, and other evidences of debt, they gave you $2,000,000,000, while their productive power was stimulated and sustained by a volume of currency adequate to the business of the country. While educing this wealth from our abounding raw materials and lending it to the Government, they were paying for three successive years an average of $450,000,000 of taxes, without any contributions from the southern people. Give to the poor people who have been swindled in New York, in New England, and in my own city alone, to the extent of $2,000,000 by faithless savings-banks, a place in which they may make their deposits, with the assured faith they have in the Government that their money will be kept safely, that they can get it when they may require it, and that they shall have a rate of interest about as great or nearly as great as the savings-banks promised to give them—3.65 per cent.

Sir, one set of representatives of workingmen's associations in Philadelphia, little skilled in parliamentary law, wrote me letters last week imploring me to get through the three sixty-five loan bill. Some of them had been caught by the failure of Jay Cooke; more of them by the fail- of the Franklin Savings Institution, in whose vaults they and their class had put nearly $900,000. They had gathered their remnants, and in going through their affiliated societies found that they had a little over $100,000 among them; and their letter to me (I do not happen to have it by me now) begged me to get this bill through so as to save them from the risk of robbery and fire, and enable them to deposit their earnings where they would be safe—where they would remain at low interest but without the risks of such failures as have happened to so many of the savings-banks and private bankers of the country.

Gentlemen descant upon the danger of allowing banks to receive and pay interests on deposit. Sir, I have here the message of the President of the United States in which he recognizes both this evil and the importance of having a portion of our bonds convertible at the will of the bondholder. He suggests the deposit of bonds and the withdrawal of greenbacks, and the loss of interest on the bonds by the owner while they remain on deposit. I have here the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he recognizes the popular demand for convertibility. He has no word to say for or against it, but asks that whatever measure be adopted may be well considered and guarded. I have here the report of the Treasurer of the United States in which he devotes seven pages to detailing the evils of the payment and receipts of interest on deposits by banks, and to trying to persuade Congress to authorize the issue of three sixty-five bonds, as the only means of breaking up the paying of interest on deposit and the accumulation of the funds of the country in great money centers for speculation at times when the interests of the people require absolute or nearly absolute quiet. And I have here the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, in which he presses these questions for the second time upon the attention of Congress. He does not rely upon the power of law; for he knows as we all know that laws do not control banks; that when the fact comes out that the banks have been living in violation of the laws provided for their government, they have the people under such embarrassments that those they have wronged are the first to rush to the Legislature or to Congress and ask that the penalties of the law may be repealed and the banks be not put into liquidation. He knows that no law can bind the confederated banks of the country; he knows that the charter of every New York City bank was forfeited last September. He knows that the only power he has with which to threaten banks when they certify checks to pay which no money has been deposited is to do what he does in this report—say to them as affectionate mothers say to their troublesome sons, "Now, you have been a very bad boy; do not do it again; for if you do and I catch you alone, I will punish you." He knows that when they all transgress, and the enforcement of the penalty would break up the whole system, he cannot even threaten to punish them but must palter with their iniquity and lawlessness.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURCHARD. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] desires it, I move that his time be extended.

Mr. KELLEY. I thank the gentleman from Illinois and the House.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be permitted to proceed without limit.

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLEY. The Comptroller of the Currency enforces his recommendation of this year by citing what he said on the same subject last year, filling more than a page of his report. You profess to desire to stop the payment of interest on deposits. You cannot do it by the mere force of law. Suppose you prohibit the national banks from paying interest on deposits, you cannot extend your prohibition to State banks; and if you could, you cannot prohibit private bankers from borrowing money on interest. Here is a statement of the assets and liabilities of the Philadelphia house of Jay Cooke & Co., showing quite a large list of banks which lost their Philadelphia balances, at least for the time being, when this private banking house closed its doors.

If law will not restrain the powerful and confederated corporations, how can you prevent their indulgence in these practices so fatal to legitimate business? The remedy is simple and in our own hands. It will save the Government millions of gold annually and hasten the permanent resumption of the use of gold as currency. It is to enable banks, bankers, insurance, railroad, and other corporations, merchants, farmers, and laborers to hold their own balances by inviting them to take convertible bonds at 3.65 currency interest. When we shall be wise enough to thus restore to our inconvertible-paper system the element of temporary loans the power of Wall street will be broken, and the scepter will drop from the palsied hands of its money kings. Do this and you will find the people's reserve diffused over the whole country; inactive, save as the Government may use it in the purchase of gold six per cents, and waiting the day of active business, when the bonds may be presented to the nearest assistant treasurer for redemption, or be used as domestic exchange from the East to buy the grain of the West, and from the North to buy the tobacco and cotton of the South.

This derided but beneficent system of interchangeable loans was an inherent part of our system of paper money until, as I have said, we blunderingly or criminally eliminated it on the 12th of July, 1870.

Restore it! Restore the balance-wheel, the governor of the machine, and in doing it you will break up the power of Wall street to gamble with the wealth and industry of the country. But, sir, if we fail to do it and legislate at all this session, we will work disasters wider spread and greater than those from which we are now suffering. Twenty-six of the forty-four million dollars have already been issued. Shall we withdraw them? The business of the country is paralyzed. Men, women, and children who would gladly earn, and were earning last September, honest livelihoods and laying up money for the future, are to-day out of employ by hundreds of thousands, and are living in enforced idleness. Your machinery, wonderful in its ingenuity and more wonderful in its power, stands still, coated with dust or eaten by rust. Your water-power is running to waste and your mines are yielding but a small percentage of what they were accustomed to yield. Your revenues have run down, and the savings-banks, called upon by the laboring classes who are their depositors, are notifying mine and factory owners and business men to prepare to pay their mortgages, and the work of contraction thus goes on apace. What, in view of this condition of things, will be the result if you determine to recall the twenty-six of the forty-four million reserve which have been issued?

Mr. Speaker, we have voted to issue the remaining $18,000,000. Ah, sir, that way greater danger lies, if no means be provided by which the surplus may be absorbed in seasons of commercial inactivity, and kept from Wall street and its gambling speculators; and I therefore voted against the proposition, wild inflationist as I am said to be. Add $18,000,000 to the $26,000,000, with stagnant business, and what will there be for it to do? Why, it will go to Wall street, to Third street, to State street; it will go into the hands of the Goulds, the Vanderbilts, the Drews, whose existence is proof that man may exist without conscience, moral principle, or human sympathy, and by next August your hotels at the watering places around New York will swarm with speculators, and money will be easy; but when September shall come, and money be needed to move the crops of the West and South, we will have last September over again, but with a power increased in the double ratio of the increased volume of currency and the listlessness of the productive power and trade of the country. Let gentlemen who talk of assignats and continental money take heed while they may, and provide legitimate employment at all seasons of the year for the entire volume of our inconvertible currency.

Can you guard against this danger? Yes, gentlemen; I have shown you how, and have borrowed my suggestions from the illustrious men whose names I mentioned in the earlier part of my remarks. I ask you to consult the unimpassioned wisdom of Benjamin Franklin. I ask you to read the words with which John Jay, from his office as President of the American Congress, addressed the people. I ask you to turn to Jefferson, who in his letter to Mr. Eppes of June 24, 1813, said—

> And so the nation may continue to issue its bills as far as its wants require, and the limitations of the circulation will admit. * * * But this, the only resource which the Government could command with certainty, the States have unfortunately fooled away, may corruptly alienated to swindlers and shavers, under the cover of private banks.

I ask you, gentlemen from the South, to listen to the voice of one whom your section once idolized as its best thinker, the friend and counselor of all your great statesmen, John Taylor of Caroline. I ask you to read the marvelous addresses—marvelous for the prescience with which they portrayed the present condition of the country—of John C. Calhoun, uttered in 1834, 1837, and 1838. I could take whole pages of Mr. Calhoun's addresses and read them here, and no man who had not read them would discover, except in their more finished style and choicer language, that I was not elaborating the thoughts I have drummed into your ears so often during this session. Turn to James Madison also. I know it is often said Mr. Madison when young, and Mr. Madison when old, were not the same man; that in the course of his long life he was on both sides of every question; but it so happens that on the question I am considering, especially that of Government using its credit as money, he was consistent, so far as I have been able to discover, throughout his long life.

Sir, such a system as my bill proposes will not only give consistency and steadiness to our business, not only give safety to depositors, not only create small money centers all over the country, but it will open the way to truly free banking. Charter no more banks; grant no more monopoly privileges; but substitute a greenback of like denomination for every bank-note which goes into the Treasury, and surrender the bonds by which these notes are secured to the banks as fast as they are redeemed by this process and let them sell them for greenbacks on which to bank. Then banking will be free; and why should it not be? Why should not men select the corporation or individual with which they will deposit their money as freely as they select their doctor, their lawyer, and their clergyman? Why should not the people select the banker with whom they will intrust their funds just as they do their grocer, their shoemaker, their tailor, and their drygoods merchant? Whence does the Government derive the paternal right to regulate these matters for them?

Banking, the borrowing and lending of credit, of purchasing power, is a mere matter of business between man and man, with which the Government has nothing to do. It should issue and be responsible for the money of the nation, and then no man could lose a dollar by using paper money so long as there was a tax to pay to the Government, or an article to purchase from his fellow-citizen. But more than this, sir; under this free system little money centers would organize themselves throughout the South and West; private and corporate balances would find use in the localities in which they were produced; bankers would receive deposits, and they would be able to show their depositors a reserve which was earning them 3.65 per cent., and which the credit and faith of the Government were pledged to redeem in greenbacks on presentation.

More than that, it would enable the Government to bring home the gold-bearing bonds from abroad; it would lessen our interest account, and change its character from gold to paper; for the money received from convertible bonds is by the provisions of my bill to be applied to the redemption of gold-bearing bonds. Ah! but, say gentlemen, you say the committee's bill will produce speculation in bonds; what would the process you propose do? Why, let me add, as I intend to do, a clause, "or to purchase gold wherewith to call bonds," and my bill would create no speculation in bonds. If the Secretary of the Treasury should receive ten millions or hundreds of millions in exchange for three sixty-five bonds and had the choice to buy either bonds or gold with which to call overdue bonds, he could restrain speculation in both. There could be no effective combination against him then. Let him reduce his gold indebtedness by issuing the greenbacks now in his possession in exchange for six per cents, and apply the interest thus saved with the proceeds of three sixty-fives to call in other 6 per cent. bonds, and our interest account will run down rapidly, while the assured elasticity given to the currency will reanimate our industries and all will go "merry as marriage-bells" throughout our country in less than six months, and our national credit will stand higher than it has ever done.

But other gentlemen say these bonds might come in unexpectedly to the Treasury. Well, my bill proposes to guard against this unlikely contingency. It proposes to restore the law to what it was in the beginning. It goes to the shades of the fathers of the system and asks them for guidance. They who instituted the system foresaw all such contingencies and provided for them by ordaining a redemption fund of $50,000,000, applicable to the redemption of temporary loans when presented in emergencies. An incident not likely to happen in these happier days compelled the invasion of that fund—an incident of war when troops had to be paid; when disaster dogged our steps, and the revenues fell off. At that time, when the confidence in the resources of the Government was briefly impaired, that fund was drawn upon, and $33,000,000 of it were out on the 31st of August, 1865. There are no contingencies like that pending now, and that fund could be held so that if these bonds came in at any day in excess of current income and resources that $50,000,000 could be drawn upon, and when the unusual demand ceased it could be replenished from current income.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What inducement would there be to any man owning a 3.65 per cent. bond to return it to the Treasury for redemption? Why would not they circulate as money just as well as the greenbacks with which they would be redeemed?

Mr. KELLEY. In reply permit me to say that I have alluded to the fact that convertible bonds would constitute domestic exchange, and that is why the banks and bankers dislike them so much; they make a great deal of profit out of buying and selling exchange. I can see no reason why these bonds under any circumstances should be rushed in for redemption; but assuming that there might be a conspiracy among bankers, bondholders, and other capitalists to corner the Treasury, I inserted the clause I have referred to out of what I believe lawyers call abundant caution, not because I saw any necessity for it, but to remove doubts from the minds of others. The soundness of my opinion has been proven by experience.

When the great Chicago fire took place which consumed so many million dollars' worth of merchandise and property, which lasted, I think, four days, and spread consternation throughout the banking, insurance, and commercial circles of the whole country, there were $70,000,000 of overdue 3 per cent. certificates outstanding; and what amount do you suppose went into the Treasury during the four days of that fire and two days thereafter? Why, $1,500,000. And I have no doubt that if $500,000,000 of these bonds were out, and a similar fire should occur, the fact that it was known there were so many out would protect the Treasury against a run for a single dollar.

Now, by way of drawing to a conclusion, permit me to say that I discover in the committee's bill a very ingeniously disguised system of contraction by the retirement of all existing issues of national currency.

You will find it in the latter sections of the bill. It is very simple and very plausible. It proposes that $2,000,000 of greenbacks, payable in gold twenty-four months after date, shall be issued monthly, and that $2,000,000 of the existing greenbacks shall be retired, having been substituted by the gold greenbacks, and that that process shall continue as long as there is a note of the existing issues outstanding. Let us see how this would work. At the end of twenty-four months there would be $48,000,000 of gold-bearing greenbacks out. Then the first $2,000,000 issued would have to be redeemed. Now let us follow it up. For twenty-four months it would be simply an exchange of one kind of greenbacks for another. But let us go into the twenty-fifth month. Then there will be issued $2,000,000 of gold-bearing greenbacks, and $2,000,000 of legal tenders will be withdrawn. The Treasury will pay off and cancel the $2,000,000 of gold-bearing greenbacks first issued. Gentlemen will now see where the little joker comes in. Each month $2,000,000 of gold-bearing greenbacks will be issued, $2,000,000 will be redeemed, and $2,000,000 of existing legal-tenders retired, until we shall come to a time when there will be but $48,000,000 of common greenbacks out; and then for each month thereafter, for twenty-four months, we will take up $2,000,000 of them; and then we will land where? There will not be a legal-tender greenback of the present issue in circulation; they will all have been redeemed, and if no mishap shall have occurred we will be in the happy land of specie payment.

And we will remain there how long? As I have already demonstrated, we will remain there until France, or Germany, or England determines that either for their convenience or from their jealousy of our prosperity and growth it would be well enough to trip us up and exhibit our weakness and dependence. Then they will sell a few million dollars' worth of goods or bonds, for gold-bearing greenbacks, which they will present for redemption, and ship the proceeds—the basis of our currency. Then we shall be just where we were in 1857, when the Old Lady of Threadneedle street needed, or thought she did, $7,000,000 of gold coin. Our currency was then on a specie basis. What did she do? She requested some of her customers to draw on us for that amount of specie, and they did. The notes were presented for redemption; and there was a terrible noise in Cincinnati, especially about the doors of the Ohio Life and Trust Company, and a noise equally as great, or perhaps greater, about the doors of the Pennsylvania Bank in Philadelphia. And the next day there was a feu de joie all over the country. Never did financial institutions explode more rapidly. There was scarcely a solvent bank in the country. The Bank of England had exhausted them, as she will do again if we venture on the ingenious expedient of substituting redeemable greenbacks for the legal tenders of to-day and redeeming them before we shall have brought home in exchange for temporary loans or otherwise at least the principal of $50,000,000 annual interest in gold-bearing bonds now held abroad and shall have put our carrying and foreign trade into such a condition as shall give us a steady balance against the gold-using nations of the world.

And, Mr. Speaker, I thank the great Disposer of events that that day is coming apace. The largest ship ever launched, except the Great Eastern, was launched the other day near the borders of my district. She was built of Pennsylvania iron. And her twin sister, of more than five thousand tons burden, lies in the same yard ready for launching. John Roach & Sons have other ships upon the stocks, the Cramps are actively employed, and the Wilmington and Camden iron-ship builders are all as busy as they can be constructing gallant vessels to again carry the Stars and Stripes over the commercial waters of the world. The orders for this work preceded the panic. Shall they have others? If such is to be the case, we must not paralyze them, must not contract their money and make them pay inordinate rates of interest, must not withdraw the medium of exchange by which they pay their laborers; and must not force those laborers to lend their money to recklessly managed savings-banks, national banks, or to private bankers, to be sent into Wall street to be speculated with until they themselves fail and then issue certificates of deposits in order, as they will modestly tell us, to prevent a further emission of irredeemable currency by the United States Government. The destinies of the present generation are in our hands, and our constituents will hold us responsible for the fidelity with which we execute the trust.

Mr. MERRIAM. As we are in the pursuit of knowledge under difficulties, I would like only five minutes to correct some impressions that the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] may have made upon the House.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] said some time ago that he wanted to ask me some questions.

Mr. BURCHARD. I merely desired to correct a statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and to call his attention to it. He said that there were no temporary certificates; that the temporary certificates that were out in 1869 had been retired since that time. Now, I desired in all kindness to call his attention to the fact that in 1869 the temporary certificates, so called, had been retired, all excepting $180,000. I presume the gentleman referred to the 3 per cent. certificates which were then outstanding to the amount of about $55,000,000, which have since been retired under the act of 1870, that act permitting national-bank notes to be issued to take their place. As I stated, the amount of 3 per cent. certificates and paper currency extant and outstanding January 1, 1869, was from twenty to twenty-five million dollars less than is out at the present time. It was then about $752,000,000; a year ago it was about $751,000,000, and it is now about $776,000,000. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will examine the Treasury reports which are here, he will find that the statement I made was correct. I merely desired at the time to correct the language the gentleman was using, and not to interrupt the thread of his argument.

Mr. MERRIAM. I wish to occupy only a moment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has used the argument that the South and the West would not want to establish banks, if they had the opportunity, under the free-banking system. He states that there are between four and five millions dollars of banking circulation now belonging to the West, and which it has not taken up. This is a fact, but there is no gentleman on this floor, especially none from the West or the South, who does not know that when applications have been made to the Comptroller of the Currency it has been impossible to get any currency, for this reason: As these applications were made to the Comptroller for the establishment of new banks he made an entry in each case, and only within the last thirty days has he given notice that unless those gentlemen in the West who have made application come forward within thirty days and take up the currency, he will give it to others who are applying and who do want it. This is the reason why the West has not taken up this currency; not because they would not take it if they could get it.

Now one other point. The gentleman has alluded to the value of greenbacks in the city of New York during the panic. I simply want to say that the national-bank notes at that time stood at the same price exactly as greenbacks did.

One question which was asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] was not answered to my satisfaction by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and I take the liberty of answering it. The gentleman from Massachusetts asked why there would be a rush on the Treasury for the payment of these three sixty-five notes? I will tell him. If these three sixty-five reconvertible bonds are issued, the banks in this country stand ready to-day to take $150,000,000 of them; that is, they are willing the Government of the United States shall pay them that interest, instead of their being obliged, as they are to-day, to take the legal-tender notes without interest. Now, suppose that the banks held $150,000,000 of three sixty-five bonds, which when a panic comes are loaded heavy with interest. Now they are not going to pay out those three sixty-five bonds to their customers, but they are going to demand of the Treasury the immediate payment of the $150,000,000 with interest; and I would like to know how the Treasury of the United States could successfully meet such a demand unless the greenbacks are held on hand all the time, without any benefit to the Government, while it is subjected to the expense of paying interest at 3.65 per cent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] will allow me to answer the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] I should be glad to do so. Why should a bank receiving interest at 3.65 on these bonds, go and return them to the Treasury, thus losing the 3.65 interest, rather than pay out the bonds to their customers, whereby they lose the interest to the same amount? Why would the banks prefer to pay expressage and incur the risk of loss in order to send these bonds to the Treasury, (thereby losing the interest,) instead of paying out the bonds to their customers, when called on, for cash?

Mr. MERRIAM. I understand that on these bonds, as on every other bond, the interest for so long as the bond has been out is payable when the bond is presented.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is payable when the bond is presented; that is true. But the interest stops when the bond is presented; and so it stops to the bank when it pays the bond to its customers. So that is an even thing.

Mr. MERRIAM. But the gentleman does not see the point.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think I do.

Mr. MERRIAM. I am supposing the banks to hold $150,000,000 in three sixty-five bonds, loaded heavy with interest.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. With what interest?

Mr. MERRIAM. Interest on the three sixty-five bonds.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How should they be loaded with interest? They collect their interest quarterly.

Mr. MERRIAM. Not quarterly, but every six months.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well.

Mr. MERRIAM. Now, suppose that the bonds have due upon them the interest for five months and twenty-nine days.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. MERRIAM. Then instead of paying out these bonds to their customers, they of course send them to the Treasury and demand legal tenders with interest.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think I see the gentleman's point. Now, why should the banks demand payment of the bonds in legal tenders except for the purpose of obtaining their interest? Hence it is of no consequence whether they send the $150,000,000 of three sixty-five bonds back to the Treasury or whether they pay them out to their customers. They will collect their interest undoubtedly. But they are not going to send the bonds to the Treasury for the sake of getting the greenbacks, and then paying the greenbacks to their customers. Their interest stops either way. If they return the bonds to the Treasury and get the greenbacks, the interest stops. If they pay them to their customers, the banks no longer receive the interest. They have not the slightest earthly inducement to go through the performance of sending the bonds to the Treasury, paying the expressage and running the risk of loss in transmission. All they would care for would be to collect the interest due them; and we do not expect them to pay out the bonds to their customers without calculating and collecting the interest due upon them. The very object of making the interest on these bonds exactly 3.65 is that weak-minded financiers may be able readily to calculate the interest—one cent a day on $100. The banks will pay out these bonds at their face value with accrued interest. You and I will take them, if we can get them, instead of certified checks, which we cannot use anywhere except through the clearing-house, and which are evidence of bank insolvency. Why should we not take these bonds with the accrued interest? Why should the banks be obliged to send them to the Treasury to get their interest when you and I would be glad to take the bonds at their face value with the accrued interest?

Mr. MERRIAM. That is just the point. We would not do it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why not? A three sixty-five bond would be just as good as greenbacks for the amount of the bond, with the accrued interest added. Why should we not take it at that valuation just as quickly as greenbacks for a like amount?

Mr. MERRIAM. The people want currency.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why should they not use the bond for currency? But no man will want currency for it. I buy your ship and hand you a bond in payment. You buy this gentleman's farm and hand him a bond, and every day there is added to it one cent per hundred dollars interest per day, and I can calculate that without much expense of paper.

Mr. MERRIAM. That might be answered in one word.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, answer it in one word.

Mr. MERRIAM. Why do not the people of the United States pay United States bonds instead of legal tenders?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I can tell you that in one minute. Let me explain the matter, for I see you do not understand that part of it. I will tell you the reason for that. It is because United States bonds have a fluctuating value. Take the last panic, for instance. A man comes to me and asks me to lend him $50,000. I have $50,000 in five per cents. He offers me 10 per cent. interest for six months. I know he is good, and I am ready to take his note; but the difficulty is if I sell my ten-forty bonds—my five per cents.—and give him the money, six months hence, when he pays me back my money, I may have to buy back ten-forty bonds at an enhanced premium, and that premium may amount to more than 5 per cent.—5 per cent. more than I sold them for, which would altogether amount to more than the 10 per cent. which he paid me for the loan. But, on the contrary, if I had three sixty-five convertible bonds, then I would say, "Your note is good; I know it is good, and I will let you have the money; and at the end of six months you can bring me back the bond I gave you or one as good." The reason you cannot pay out five per cent. bonds is because you cannot get the greenbacks for them. The only way to get greenbacks for them is to sell them at depreciated rates when the panic comes, or else to sell them for gold and sell the gold in order to get greenbacks. That is the reason, let me tell the gentleman from New York, why they are not currency; they have not a fixed and stable value at all times. Any man who is not too stupid to be a bank clerk will see no trouble in that. Why, sir, it is settled in Euclid; for the first proposition in Euclid is that things equal to the same thing are equal to one another.

Mr. MAYNARD. There is one point in connection with the gentleman's remarks to which I would like to call his attention.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well; go on.

Mr. MAYNARD. We have heard a good deal of three sixty-five bonds. I am satisfied that a certain amount—the precise amount I have not settled in my own mind perhaps—of obligations bearing a low rate of interest would be in demand just as 3 per cent. certificates were in demand. There would be a use for them. They would be absorbed. People would be glad to get them. I have not been able to see—and I should like to have information, and for that information I claim the attention of the House—why, when we could put them out at 3 per cent., we should offer three sixty-five. The gentleman has intimated, and it is the only reason I have heard given for fixing the rate at three sixty-five, that it is one cent a day on one hundred dollars, and weak-minded capitalists could thereby compute their interest. Now there is not a boy in this land, from the pages at our sides to larger ones I see about here, who does not know instinctively how to count at the rate of six per cent. I think if there is no other argument than the argument addressed to weak-minded bankers in order to facilitate their calculations, I would suggest that three sixty-five seems to me to be somewhat of a humbug.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When a man starts off to look at a great financial problem as a mere matter of fancy or a mere matter of humbug, he is likely not to come to a right conclusion, even if he have the learning and ability of my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. MAYNARD. Very true, but that does not answer my question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will tell you why three sixty-five was chosen by me, four years and a half ago, when I brought forward that proposition to this House and elaborated it with more care and with more thought than I have ever bestowed upon any proposition, whether of law, finance, or politics; it is this: My proposition was to bring our currency not to be redeemable in gold, but to be equal to gold. I looked over all the investments of the world, and I found that the average interest paid on the investments of a gold dollar in government securities was a little rising 3 per cent. Take all the investments of the world, and you will find the average interest on a gold dollar, under all governments, is a little rising 3 per cent.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call the attention of the gentleman in this connection to the English consols which bear 3 per cent. interest, and I submit that the rate of our Government ought to be only as high, not higher.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Ah! pardon me; the gentleman does not apprehend the point at all. The 3 per cent. consols of England are not at par.

Mr. MAYNARD. They sometimes have been.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They do not remain at par; sometimes they are at 94, and at 92, and at 88, according to the fluctuations of the money market. I say again, the average interest a man can get in the world on Government security for a gold dollar is a little rising 3 per cent., as all 3 per cent. loans are more or less below par. Now, then, I propose that our greenback currency shall be as productive to the holder of it for investment as the average gold dollar of the world is to the holder of it, and at the same time, therefore, be a blessing and a convenience. I propose to put it at 3.65; sometimes it will be more than that average, sometimes less. The value of the dollar of the United States should always be, that a man can get 3.65 for it from the Government when he cannot get any more; that it shall always be to him an investment at the rate of 3.65—a little better investment than the average gold dollar of the world. And that is the way in which you can fix the value of money. It is not by gold, which fluctuates and always has fluctuated, depreciating from the time when the good Samaritan took compassion on the wounded man, and carried him to a first-class tavern in Judea, and gave the landlord a penny, saying, "I will call in a day or two, and pay what else is due"—it has fallen in value from that day to this. And if any of you wish to ascertain the difference in the value of gold between then and now take a wounded monk to Willards', and offer them a penny to take care of him there for a day or two, and you will find very soon how much gold has cheapened.

Sir, if the House will bear with me a moment, there are two theories upon which the value of money is regulated in the world. I heard my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] say the other day that it is regulated by the value of gold, as if that of itself was a standard. Pardon me; how is the value of gold regulated? Did that ever occur to him?

A MEMBER. By the brokers.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not the value of it; the use of it is regulated in that way. How do you estimate the value of gold? By saying that a certain cube of it is to weigh—how much? Twenty-four carats. What is a carat? An Abyssinian bean. Take twenty-four Abyssinian beans, and then you have a standard for gold. Well, you thereby fix the standard weight so that the standard weight does not change; but how does England fix the value of her money? She fixes it by making it redeemable in gold. But how does she fix the value of gold? By her bank running its rate of interest up and down, so as to keep gold at a regular value. If you call for a million pounds sterling at the bank of England she instantly puts up her interest, and if the demand for gold continues she puts it up, up, sometimes as high as 12 per cent. She has done it four times since 1843, and if there is any irredeemable currency in the United States which works worse than that I should like to see it. I say, then, that there are two systems of regulating the value of money; one is to regulate the value of gold by changing the rate of interest at the great money centers, as England and France, and the other is to regulate the value of money by fixing the rate of interest—by having a fixed rate of interest for which you can always use a dollar. What do you want with a dollar? To buy a breakfast; to buy a coat; or—and that is the last thing you want it for—to pay your debts. If you have any surplus then left, if you wish to invest a dollar, how do you wish to invest it? Do you wish to invest it permanently, and then you want as high a rate of interest as you can get. If you want to leave it where you can get it at pleasure to invest permanently in some business, what do you do with it? You go to a savings-bank and invest it at 4 per cent., or you go to a trust company and invest it at 4 per cent. I propose that instead of going to a trust company or savings-bank, to invest your money at a low rate of interest while you are not using it in business, you should come to the United States and invest it in a three sixty-five bond; thus diminishing the interest the people are paying, and having your money where you can find it when a panic comes. That is the proposition which I had the honor to elaborate some five years ago, and, thank God! I believe the people of the country, and the good sense of the business men of the country, are gradually coming in to my view. And I am very glad that my friend from Pennsylvania has taken a step in the right direction.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would ask the gentleman whether, in his opinion, it is not better for the public that the rate of interest paid by the Government should be rather under than over the general average, because the rate of interest paid by the Government necessarily affects the rate paid in all private transactions?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Precisely; it should be under. And what is the average rate of interest in this country to-day? Upon bonded indebtment and bank loans it is 8 per cent; and I want to bring it largely under that rate. What is the average rate of interest paid by your Government, your States, your corporations, your railroads; by the great indebtment which is the greatest investment of the country? It is 5 or 6 or 7 per cent. in gold; it is 6 or 7 or 8 or 9 per cent. in currency.

What I desire is to have a low rate of interest for the Government to pay, say 3.65. To-day our 4 per cent. bonds payable in gold are almost ready to be taken at par; and that is about 5 per cent. in currency as gold stands now. Therefore I am endeavoring to fix a low rate of interest, easy of calculation, for that is an advantage; easy of understanding, because it is to be issued in fifties and multiples of fifty. The rate of interest will be a half a cent a day on each fifty dollars, a little better, let me repeat, than the average rate for the gold dollar of the world; so that our currency may come up to be equal with gold, be equal to gold; so that the man who has a United States dollar in his pocket may feel that he has a permanent investment as good as though he had a gold dollar in England. That is the ground upon which I put the currency of the country.

A word or two further on these general topics, as I am on my feet.

I hear a great deal said about "an irredeemable paper currency." What is currency? It is an instrument of exchange, an instrument to work with, to use, to measure values, to carry on transactions. Why does not somebody get up here and make us an argument about an irredeemable yard-stick, or an irredeemable quart pot, or an irredeemable bushel measure, or an irredeemable Fairbanks scale? Why should we want to redeem this instrument of exchange, this measure of value? We want to use it all the time. What we want is this: we want in the spring, in the summer, in the winter, a place where we can invest or place at interest this instrument of exchange, so as not to be obliged to loan it out to trust companies. Those trust companies in order to make a profit on it must loan it out on long time, so that we cannot get it in the fall when we want it; it cannot be drawn out at once, certainly and surely, for the purpose of moving the crops in the fall, and thus causes a stringency in the market, a depreciation of all values, at the very time the money is most needed and when it should be as cheap as ever it can be.

The great advantage of the three sixty-five bond is that instead of lending it to a trust company or to a savings-bank, which will have to loan it at a high rate of interest to some one else in order that it may make a profit out of it, it will be lent to the Government. And every dollar thus loaned to the Government brings down our rate of interest which we now pay, 6 or 7 per cent., to 3.65. That will take the burden off the people, and relieve my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. GARFIELD,] from the necessity of paring down the appropriations to less than we need, thereby throwing workmen of the country out of employment in order to save a few dollars.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I would like to ask the gentleman a question just here.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish to ask the gentleman why this paper money issued by the Government should be made legal tender between private individuals?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will tell the gentleman why. It is because that has always been the office of money. All nations have had a fixed standard of value, which they make legal tender in private transactions, so that it may be the measure of those transactions. I heard my friend from Pennsylvania say that there was never anything but gold used for money by all civilized and barbarous nations.

Mr. GARFIELD. You mean the gentleman from New Jersey, not the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes; did I say the gentleman from Pennsylvania? I beg Pennsylvania's pardon; no idea like that could come from anywhere except New Jersey.

Now let us search out that. In the first place I declare, and I am ready to maintain, that gold has rarely been the currency of any nation until very lately. Let us go back a little. What was the currency of the Athenian republic? Brass. Of Lacedæmon? Iron. Where do you get the idea of pecuniary value? From the Romans; from pecus, the sheep, which was used as the legal tender by the Romans.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman will allow me, there is another etymology of "pecuniary."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It comes from pecus, a sheep.

Mr. MAYNARD. It comes from the figure of a sheep stamped on the coin.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; the figure of a sheep was stamped on the coin when government wanted to control its subjects. A piece of brass was substituted with a sheep stamped on it, which the poor man could not eat, for the sheep which the poor man could eat.

Mr. MELLISH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question about the three sixty-fives?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In a moment. Now let me go on a little further. My New Jersey friend [Mr. PHELPS] also told us that his friend, A. A. Low, went abroad to China, and there they would not take from him "the best currency of the world;" they would take nothing but gold for their tea. To that I answer that the Chinese are not such fools as to take gold. They will take nothing but the Mexican silver dollar, and our silver trade dollar. And we have had to make a special trade currency in order to trade with China—a special currency representing a little higher value than any currency which we use ourselves, or than we would use in our own transactions.

Mr. BURCHARD. They take it according to weight and fineness.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Precisely; and they take our trade dollar because of that weight and fineness. That is just what I am coming to in a moment. If gentlemen will be quiet they will find that I will not leave out any part of this matter.

What next? Germany is just now demonetizing silver, and substituting gold. France has only within a few years used any substantial quantity of gold coin. The great increase of silver in amount has demonetized it in many countries. Now, then, my friend is right. What gives it its value as money? It is the stamp; it is nothing else.

Mr. BURCHARD. Will my friend allow me to suggest that the Government merely gives the name, not the value? The Government stamps the name upon the coin, and says "so much weight and fineness constitute a dollar;" and it goes as of that weight and fineness. If a guinea is less than the prescribed weight, it will circulate at its real weight.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is there any doubt that gold, as far as regards intrinsic value, is among the least valuable of all metals, being put to the fewest uses, except for the purpose of ornament? The Spartan was right when he made iron the currency on its intrinsic value. The only trouble was, it took a great deal to carry on the business; and it would take a great deal in weight of gold to carry on business. We cannot carry on even the business of this country in gold without an amount of gold greater than that which exists in the world.

But what is money? Moneta—the stamp—the admonishment of the Government, saying, "This is of a certain value." Why, sir, take your nickel currency as an example. There is not seventy-five cents' worth of nickel in five dollars of that currency issued, if you go to the intrinsic value by weight. But we all take it as a matter of convenience upon the stamp of the Government.

Why should we put the "image and superscription of Cæsar" upon a piece of gold, if we can make an instrument of exchange which is of the value of gold and serves all the uses of gold as money; which passes between man and man and between the Government and the citizen as money; which can be invested as well as any other money? Why do you need anything better than that, whether it is stamped on leather or paper, gold, silver, or nickel?

But it is said you must have it stamped upon gold, because otherwise you cannot trade with other nations. Now, no man knows better than my friend of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. BURCHARD] that no dollar of our gold ever crosses the ocean as gold money. In payment of our debts, and even of our interest, it crosses the ocean as so much buillion; worth so much by weight; and the moment it gets on the other side it goes into the melting-pot. So, if they send their gold coin here, the moment it arrives on this side it goes into the melting-pot. So it is between all nations of the earth.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Does not the Bank of England pay out guineas by weight and not by count?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir, as a convenient mode of counting them.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The stamp does not count for anything there; it is the weight.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; that is a convenient way of counting.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is it not so that if one guinea should be under weight no person may be obliged to take it for more than what it weighs?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They weigh the coin because that is a convenient way of counting; and therein they only imitate the Chinese.

Mr. MAYNARD. The same thing is done at our custom-houses.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It is not, then, the stamp that counts for anything?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. After the gold gets out of the Bank of England, it is the stamp that gives it its value, so that it passes as money.

Mr. GARFIELD. What gives it value when it gets into the smelting-pot, where the stamp is obliterated?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It has no value then as money; it gets a value as bullion, precisely as a bushel of wheat has a value when it gets into the oven and becomes bread, but not as money. It is good for something but not good for money.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, yes; I suppose on this matter I must meet all comers.

Mr. BURLEIGH. How much more purchasing power is there in the currency of the country to-day than there was before the last $26,000,000 were issued?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have examined that and made a calculation. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for asking me that question.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Taking account of stock to-day, that $26,000,000 costs this country $61,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let us examine that. If it is true, I will vote the other way.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Very well; take an account of stock, and see.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; let us take an account of stock. What part of the business of this country is done by our greenbacks or currency? I have heard numbers of our contractionists—I do not use the term invidiously, because they will be very much ashamed of the title one of these days—I have heard numbers of these gentlemen who want a gold-based currency say that only about 3 per cent. of our business is done with money. The rest is done by other instruments of exchange.

Let me formulate that for a moment. The business of the country at wholesale is done by the bank-book, the bill-book, the ledger, the check-book, promissory note, and bill of exchange, the currency of wholesale. The retail business of the country is done with money. They all say 3 per cent. of the whole buisness is done with money; but I am willing to make it five—that 5 per cent. is done by money. We, in other words, use $756,000,000 of currency, which is only 5 per cent. of the business of property-buying and property-selling in this country through the medium of exchange. I take 5 per cent.; very well, how much is the whole, then? Rising $15,000,000,000; and yet all the exchanges made in this country by money only equal a use of 5 per cent. Now we have injected into this business $44,000,000 by our vote.

Mr. MERRIAM. Twenty-six millions.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Forty-four millions by our vote; I am going to give you the full force of the inflation. I will not stop at $26,000,000. How much is $44,000,000 of the purchasing and exchanging currency of the country? Twenty-nine hundredths of 1 per cent. That is all. Fifteen billions, the sum of all business of exchange, of which $756,000,000 is 5 per cent. Men on the opposite side say it is only 3 per cent., but I will admit it is 5. What part, then, of the whole amount of exchange is $44,000,000? Twenty-nine hundredths of 1 per cent. Now, suppose we watered our instruments of exchange by throwing a perfectly useless medium into them. We shall then only have inflated it twenty-nine hundredths of 1 per cent. Twenty-nine hundredths of 1 per cent.! Now, then, does any man mean to say that watering is too much—twenty-nine hundredths of 1 per cent.? Let me use a simile which we can all understand. Would a man think his whisky very much watered if he only got twenty-nine hundredths of 1 per cent. of water put into it? Not much.

Let us go a little further. My friend behind me says that depends upon how many times it is used. I agree with him. Let me tell you how many times it has to be used. I have already said that this money currency is but the money of retail. Now there are two ways to show that we have too little currency. The first is this: The amount, $756,000,000, was fixed in 1868 as a matter of contraction, but we have grown at least 7 per cent. a year since that, and there is 40 per cent. more business and property in this country than there was then. Therefore, if only currency enough then, how much will we have to extend it now to get it up to the growth of the country? It would be 40 per cent. of $756,000,000, or $302,000,000, which is a trifle larger than $44,000,000.

But I do not stop there, if the House will allow me to bring their attention to it. There are five great retailers added substantially to the retail business of the country since the war, who had no business before and who do their business wholly with currency. In the first place, before the war, you had only thirty thousand miles of railroad, but to-day there are seventy-four thousand miles. The railroads, new and old, are doing now twice as much as they did before the war. All railroad business is done with currency day by day. You have to pay your fare in currency, and all this amount of currency is scooped up. Very well; another retailer is the express business, and all the ramifications of that business is done substantially by currency. Another retailer has come in, the telegraph, with its ramifications all over the country, requiring the use of money. Another retailer came in, the post-office, which has been very largely increased—at least four to one. Another still greater retailer has come in—four millions of people have been brought into this country to use our money who used nothing before 1860—not a dollar; they are all retailers, the four million negroes, and they have not a bank-book or a check-book. They have their wages and their wants, and those wants are all supplied by money, and their wages are all paid by money, and their savings are all hoarded up in money. So there are five great sources of retail business we did not have before the war substantially. And thus I reply to the question so well put as to how many times our currency has to be used?

Again, we have twelve million workingmen and women in the country who receive wages. Will you admit they earn, high salaries and low, on an average two dollars a day—sixty dollars a month? If you should pay their wages on a given and the same day in the month it would take $720,000,000, which is more currency than you have in circulation, deducting the bank reserves.

Mr. BURLEIGH. You do not answer my question at all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Perhaps not.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I ask you to explain how much more purchasing power there is in the currency of the country now than there was before the $26,000,000 were issued.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Something less than one forty-second of 1 per cent.

Mr. BURLEIGH. No, that will not do. Take account of stock. In the panic, with the balance of trade in our favor, with gold being exported, the Secretary of the Treasury thought fit to issue twenty-six millions in amount of greenbacks, which were then at 107. There were more than seven hundred millions in the market. He reduced the value of those greenbacks 5 per cent. at once, which was $35,000,000, and run the Government in debt $26,000 in gold, and that is the way we stand to-day, if you take account of stock as you would do in your own private business.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, let us examine that. But, before I answer it, let me see if I understand your proposition and can state it correctly, because there is no use in attempting to answer anything that one does not thoroughly understand. The gentleman says that at the time of the panic greenbacks were down to within 5 per cent. or 7 per cent. of gold.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Seven per cent. before the panic, and we were going on smoothly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Hold on a moment. At the time of the panic greenbacks were at 7 per cent., and now they are up to 12; and then the Secretary of the Treasury issued $26,000,000 of greenbacks, and that was a loss, and then he run in debt so much, and that was a loss.

Mr. BURLEIGH. No, no; you do not state it right.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How have we lost anything?

Mr. BURLEIGH. We ran in debt $26,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BURLEIGH. And we have $35,000,000 less in our safe or pocket to pay it with; that makes $61,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Precisely. Very well, that is so, but——

Mr. BURLEIGH. All right; if that is so, that is all I want.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Wait a moment. How were we to get that money in our pockets? By taxing the laboring people.

Mr. BURLEIGH. We had it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Hold on; it is my turn to figure now. How did we get it in our pockets? By taxing the people, and they have not paid so many taxes by $26,000,000, and thus we have grown a great deal poorer.

I have heard a great deal about this depreciated currency. What depreciated it? When the panic came every kind of property depreciated; and that is the curse and the wrong of attempting to contract in order to come down to specie payments. Let me give an illustration. I owed a note for $1,000 on the 1st day of September. I had of stock in the Eastern Railroad, of Massachusetts, a dividend-paying stock, one hundred shares. I could sell that stock for 108 on that day, and pay my note, and have $800 left. Your greenbacks had come down to within 5 per cent. of gold on the 22d of September, when my stock went down to seventy-six cents on the dollar, so that if I had sold it then to pay my note I would have been $2,400 short of paying my note and lost my $800 besides; but my note did not grow any less. Every man had to suffer from the contraction who owed debts.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Will the gentleman tell the House that the Eastern Railroad in the mean time guaranteed the Maine Central?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly it had very good property down in Maine, but I only took that road as an illustration. Take the Lake-shore Railroad, or the Western Union Telegraph Company, or any other stock; they all run down in like proportion. Which was the most stable thing: this "depreciated, irredeemable rag currency," or the property of this country? The railroad property of the country melted away to the amount of $1,000,000,000; the value of mines, manufactories—everything that is accounted wealth—went down 30 or 40 per cent., while your irredeemable currency kept up within 5 per cent. of gold, and the people hugged it and kept it, and even kept your bank rags because they were redeemable in greenbacks, in preference to any other species of property.

What is the greatest item to-day of property in this country, save real estate? National, State, corporate, and individual indebtment. Is not that by far the greatest item of value? Does any man doubt that? Very well, whatever panic comes that does not go down; whatever depreciation comes, that does not depreciate; that is fixed and unalterable. Other property goes down; creditors can sweep away all other property, but this debt goes down never.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to contract. I am willing to come back to gold or any other standard, provided we can all come down alike and together; but to take my mill, and your mine, and your railroad, and your farm down, so that the mortgages will swallow them up, while you keep the mortgages up and the debt up for the poor man to pay, is what, under God, I never, never, never will consent to by my vote and by my action here or elsewhere.

Mr. BURLEIGH. General, will you let me ask you another question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Is it or is it not desirable to have the money in your pocket as near the value of gold as possible?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, it is.

Mr. BURLEIGH. And do you not believe, where you stand now, that if the Government was relieved of these demand notes it would resume and compel the banks of this country to resume specie payments?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Well, I do.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I agree to the first proposition. I want my money as near like gold in value as possible, and that is why I fix interest at 3.65. The other question is, if the country was relieved of all its demand notes would we not be able to resume specie payments? I do not know but what, if it were relieved of any debts on demand, it would be able to pay its debts on demand, if that is what the gentleman means. But if he means this, that there is gold enough now in the country, or that you can get gold enough in the country without breaking every bank or banker in Europe, to redeem our money circulation in gold, then I do not believe it.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Do you believe that if the banks had three years' notice that they would have severe penalties imposed upon them if they did not redeem their notes in specie, they would not redeem? You know they would.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have no doubt they would.

Mr. BURLEIGH. They would fortify themselves with gold, and when they had the gold neither you nor I would want it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Ah! that is the way they would redeem, because we would not want it. The difficulty is this: I agree that our banks would fortify themselves; I agree we should go into contraction; that we should strain ourselves in every way to get gold to redeem, if we made it highly penal not to redeem. But the difficulty would be this: while the banks are so fortifying themselves, while we are so getting gold together to redeem, all values must go down, all industries must be paralyzed, and the way the banks would fortify themselves in the end would be by issuing certified checks.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Can we not make a law to compel them to redeem?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BURLEIGH. And then make laws that will allow the people to supply the demand for currency; they will do it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How will they supply the demand for currency?

Mr. BURLEIGH. Give them the privilege, and they will do it.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is in favor of free banking.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, I am in favor of free banking, and I will tell you why. If you give unlimited free banking, in my opinion in three years it will destroy the whole banking system.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I did not say "unlimited;" that is a word that you put in.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is not free banking if it is not unlimited, if I cannot bank as well as you.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to take the floor, not for the purpose of speaking at this time, but in order that I may have the floor when the consideration of this subject is again resumed by the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman would not be entitled to the floor when this subject is again resumed, but the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] will be then entitled to the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 6, 1874.

Prayer by Rev. E. D. OWEN, of Washington, D. C.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was dispensed with.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 1063) to restore Captain John C. Beaumont, of the United States Navy, to his original position on the Navy Register—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 2538) to legalize and establish a ponton railway bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien—to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 2667) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to gather authentic information as to the condition and importance of the fur trade in the Territory of Alaska—to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 81) requesting the President to intercede with Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain for the release of Edward O'Meagher Condon, now confined in prison in Manchester, England—to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, pesented a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, urging upon Congress the propriety and wisdon of granting relief to certain persons whose certificates of homestead entry, obtained in the years 1867, 1868, and 1869, under the homestead law, have been canceled by the United States because of conflict with the land grant of the Grand Rapids and Indiana Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of the school officers of the township of Sault Sainte Marie, Michigan, praying Congress to grant them for school purposes a certain portion of the military reserve, containing 1.26; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Lehr Schooler, widow of Richard Schooler, a soldier of the war of 1812, praying an amendment of the act of February 14, 1871, granting pensions to soldiers of that war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a memorial signed by 1,163 citizens of the State of Oregon, and Washington and Idaho Territories, in which they respectfully represent the importance of taking such action as will open the Columbia River to the commerce of the world, and secure an outlet for the surplus products of the great interior basin. They represent that the Columbia River and its affluents drain a country thousands of miles in extent, the lands on which are highly prolific, but owing to obstructions in the river, first at the Cascades, and next at the Dalles, it is impossible to send to market the products of this vast region; that to remove these obstructions, and open to settlement the country stretching from the Cascades on one side to the Rocky Mountains on the other, it is necessary to build a canal with suitable locks at the Cascades, and a similar one at the Dalles; that this is a work which, from its magnitude and importance, assumes a national character, and as such the memorialists ask Congress to make appropriations for preliminary surveys, and for such other action as will lead to the early removal of all obstructions to the free navigation of the Columbia River. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, presented the petition of Hugh W. Hawes, proposing for certain considerations to improve Matagorda bar and harbor and to build a canal commencing at and including the mouth of the Caney, in Matagorda County, Texas, to the mouth of the Rio Grande River, Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I present the memorial of G. W. Custis Lee, of Virginia, which sets forth that the estate in Alexandria County, Virginia, known as Arlington, was devised by Mr. Custis to his daughter, Mary Ann Randolph Lee, for life, and at her death to the memorialist, her eldest son; that Mrs. Lee has recently died, and the title is now vested in him; that during the war a direct tax amounting to $92.07 was assessed against the property in the name of Mary A. R. Lee, and the estate sold and purchased by the United States. The memorial further states that the tax and other charges were offered to the commissioners and refused by them because not tendered by Mrs. Lee in person, and that the commissioners had adopted a rule that the tax could not be paid by another person for the owner but must be paid by the owner himself, and it is insisted that these circumstances, together with others also set forth, render the title of the United States to Arlington invalid.

Mr. Lee has been advised that his claim could be enforced in the courts, but he states in his memorial, and I now say for him, that he is not in the least inclined to disturb the purposes to which the property is devoted, and therefore he comes before the Congress of the United States and asks that the Government will cause his claim to be examined, and if found good pay him a fair and reasonable price for the estate.

To attain this end I have prepared, and will now offer with the memorial, a bill conferring upon the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear the case, and if the title of Mr. Lee is found good, also to ascertain the proper compensation, and give either party an appeal to the Supreme Court. And I cannot but think that when it is suggested to Congress that the title of the Government is not good, and the reasons fairly given, the Congress ought not only to be willing but anxious to perfect the title.

In the Arkansas Hot Springs case, where the property was claimed both by the Government and by citizens, a law was passed referring the adjudication of the question to the Court of Claims, and in preparing this bill I have followed the precedent in that case.

I move that the memorial and bill be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Bills are not yet in order. When bills are reached it will be read and referred.

Mr. BOGY. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Missouri, in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River; and while I am up I will state the contents very briefly. The Legislature of the State desire that a large and adequate appropriation be made for this great object, stating that it is not local, but national, affecting the commerce of the whole western country, and furthermore expressing the desire that one of the mouths of the river be opened in opposition to a canal, they believing that a canal would not afford adequate facilities. I move its reference to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS presented resolutions of the Cawker City Board of Trade, of Mitchell County, Kansas, in respect to the memory of the late Hon. Charles Sumner; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. I have a memorial, and hardly a memorial, as it is addressed to Senators and members of Congress, not to Congress technically. I state that in frankness. It is sent me by the board of harbor commissioners and pilots of the State of New York with the request that I shall present it, being the original memorial, which sets forth the need of appropriations to care for the harbor of the city of New York, the East River, Harlem River, and so on. I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I presented the other day, in the form of a telegram, a preamble and resolution adopted by the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce in relation to the Louisville and Portland Canal. I have now a certified copy from the president of that chamber of the same matter, which I ask leave to present, and as it is very brief, I ask permission to read it:

Whereas the effect of the Wheeler amendment, embodied in the House bill, providing for the control of the Louisville and Portland Canal by the Government of the United States, insures the continuance of the existing oppressive toll for two years at least; and whereas the charge of fifty cents per ton for passing through the canal is especially oppressive, in view of the fact that freights are carried by water from the city to New Orleans at two to four dollars per ton: Therefore,

Resolved by the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, That the United States Senate be, and it is hereby, respectfully requested, in behalf of the commerce of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers and tributaries, and in advancement of the cause of cheap transportation, to reject the amendment ingrafted upon the bill on motion of Mr. Wheeler, and cause the same to be passed in such a shape as to insure the immediate control of the canal by the Government and a reduction of the tolls so as to place this improvement on an equal footing with other canals controlled by the United States.

I move that the preamble and resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHURZ presented the petition of Herman Lamprecht, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented resolutions of a meeting of colored citizens of Savannah, Georgia, in respect to the memory of the late Hon. Charles Sumner; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, in regard to the death of ex-President Fillmore; which were read as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, in the year 1874.

Resolutions on the death of Millard Fillmore, thirteenth President of the United States.

Resolved, That the Legislature of Massachusetts receives with profound sensibility and regret information of the death of Millard Fillmore, the thirteenth President of the United States.

Resolved, That as representatives of the people of the State, we deem it our duty to express in their name their regard for the various important public services, in the humblest as in the most exalted official positions, which distinguished his official life, and to mark with appropriate honors the purity of his character, the integrity of his administration, his firm adherence to his convictions of duty, and the calm, Christian dignity that attended the close of his earthly career, which entitle him to the affectionate remembrance of the American people and an honorable place in the long line of their illustrious servants.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be requested to transmit copies of the foregoing resolutions to the family of the late President Fillmore, and to the Senators and Representatives of Massachusetts in the Congress of the United States.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PRATT, it was Ordered, That the papers of William W. Spiers relating to his claim for compensation as assistant surgeon United States Army be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for the apportionment of the Territory of Wyoming for legislative purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 1122) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha E. Northup, widow of First Lieutenant Edward B. Northup, late of the Seventeenth United States Infantry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 661) to give jurisdiction to the Court of Claims to hear the claim of G. W. Custis Lee to Arlington; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 662) for the relief of Mary C. Stirling, (tutrix of her minor children,) of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 663) for the relief of Julius Reinberg, of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 664) amendatory of an act to limit the liability of ship-owners, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1851; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PRATT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 665) for the relief of William W. Spiers, late assistant surgeon United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 666) granting to the Nevada County Narrow-Gauge Railroad Company a right of way through the public lands for a railroad; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 667) to release the government of Japan from the payment of the balance of the indemnity fund remaining unpaid, amounting to $375,000, under the convention of October 22, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ROBERTSON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 668) to incorporate the Anglo-American Mutual Company; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 670) for the relief of certain officers named therein; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIM OF R. M. AND S. A. DOUGLAS.

Mr. MERRIMON. I desire to accompany the introduction of a resolution which I now offer by an explanatory remark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to submit some remarks on a resolution which he proposes to offer. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MERRIMON. It will be remembered that the other day when I made a report in the matter of the claim of Robert M. and Stephen A. Douglas a resolution was passed by the Senate for the reference of the claim, so far as it related to cotton seized, to the Court of Claims. It was then suggested by the Chair that it was not proper for the Senate alone to make this reference, but on looking at the statute it was found that the court was so organized as to give it jurisdiction of any claim that might be referred to it by either branch of Congress. The counsel of Messrs. Douglas, on looking at the statute in view of which the Senate acted and the subsequent statute in reference to abandoned property, are of opinion that the subsequent statute is such as to require a joint resolution to give jurisdiction in a case like this. I therefore offer a resolution to rescind the resolution adopted the other day, and then I shall ask leave to introduce a joint resolution:

Resolved, That the resolution adopted April 1, 1874, referring the papers in relation to the claim of Robert M. and Stephen A. Douglas to the Court of Claims be, and the same is hereby, rescinded; and that the Secretary be directed to request that the papers in relation to the said claim be returned by the Court of Claims to the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I now ask leave to introduce a joint resolution to accomplish the purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that under a former ruling it was directed or recommended that all legislation should be in the form of bills.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask the Clerk then to change the title from joint resolution to a bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 669) referring the petition and papers in the case of Robert M. and Stephen A. Douglas, in so far as the same relates to cotton seized, to the Court of Claims was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Those who sit in the portion of the Hall where I am located heard only imperfectly the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina. They relate, as I understand, to a claim large in amount and to which I want to interpose no objection now on the merits, but it belongs to a class of claims worthy of careful consideration, and I hope the Senator will not ask to put this bill on its passage now until we can know more about it than some of us at least do.

Mr. MERRIMON. As there is objection, I will not ask the Senate to consider the bill now, but I will ask that the report which accompanied the resolution I reported the other day be printed. That will be necessary for the consideration of the subject.

The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. On reflection I ask that the bill which I introduced a moment ago for the relief of Messrs. Robert M. and Stephen A. Douglas be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill was read the second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Secretary will report the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am told by the Secretary that the bill in relation to the Louisville and Portland Canal is not the unfinished business; that the finance bill is the unfinished business. That being so, I move that the Louisville and Portland Canal bill be taken up now with a view to its disposition this morning.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope we shall go through the morning hour as we have been doing for some time, by acting on the bills on the Calendar in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREERY] has the floor on this bill and wishes to speak upon it for a few minutes, and after that I have no doubt that we can agree to a disposition of the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would much rather have it done after the morning hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would prefer not to have further delay.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Kentucky a question? Is there any serious objection to allowing the canal bill to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which one Senator from Ohio is a member? I think the committee could speedily and fully inform the Senate upon the question of law involved, and we could act at once. I make the suggestion, not in interest of delay, but in the interest of expedition in disposing of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Kentucky, who represents the State in which this work is, feels that it is due to him, as he had not the opportunity to say anything the other day, that he should be allowed to express his views.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg my friend to believe that I do not mean to interpose against the Senator from Kentucky; far from it; I wish to hear him. I only ask as to the ultimate disposition of the bill when the Senator shall have concluded his remarks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will consult with Senators about the disposition of the bill.

The motion of Mr. SHERMAN was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

Mr. MCCREERY. Mr. President, I sought the floor on Friday last with a view of expressing a few thoughts on this subject; but the Presiding Officer recognized another Senator, who made the very popular motion for adjournment, and it was carried. I now propose to occupy the attention of the Senate only for a few moments.

Whatever obligation might have rested upon me in the beginning to speak upon a measure so deeply affecting the agricultural and mechanical interests of the West has almost faded away before the light which has been already thrown upon this question. I feel that it would be utterly impossible for me to add a particle to the force of the statements and arguments which have been submitted with reference to the Louisville and Portland Canal. No amount of ingenuity and sophistry could either exaggerate or diminish the importance of that great work. Kentucky has no more and no less interest in it than half a dozen other States whose borders are washed by the waters of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, and whose commerce has been taxed for the aggrandizement of a private corporation. From the day of its completion to the present time every western man, from the Lakes to the Balize, has realized the prime necessity of the free navigation of the Ohio. So imperious have been the demands of the people of Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois in that direction that the corporators, although their dividends varied from 10 to 15 per cent., generously sacrificed their private interests to the public good, and transferred their stock at par to the Government of the United States. Whatever may be the fate of the pending measure, the generosity and patriotism which prompted this action stand without a parallel and must be regarded as an earnest of perfect good faith in the transaction.

It is difficult to comprehend the ultimate object of those who are seeking by a reference to postpone action on the part of Congress. Kentucky passed precisely such laws as were deemed requisite and ample to divest that State and its citizens of all right and title in and to the canal, and to invest the same in the Government under the terms and conditions understood by the parties. It is in the nature of a solemn compact or agreement that neither party has any right to vary, modify, or change, without the consent of the other. These are the plain principles of law and of common sense applicable alike to contracts between individuals or between separate and independent States. It is therefore manifest to my mind that an attempt to levy a State tax on a canal after its cession to the General Government and its acceptance by the Government would be as inoperative as a similar attempt to tax a custom-house, a post-office, or any other public building; and so I believe it would be held and determined by the courts.

But this tender regard for the rights of the States has sprung from a quarter from which it might have been least expected; and however grateful the news may be to the people of Louisiana, it is still a matter of profound regret that its first development involved a merciless assault upon the honest sons of toil who vainly believed that the hour of deliverance was at hand.

But giving the broadest and fullest scope to the objection, and admitting that Kentucky not only asserts but maintains and enforces the right of taxation, what are you going to do? After expending millions of treasure in completing the work and when it is ready to meet the demands of commerce by securing safe and cheap transportation to the people, will you upon the pretense of a fear of an imaginary danger of taxation abandon the enterprise, leaving the industry of the Mississippi Valley a prey to the rapacity of the five shareholders who are willing for $500 to transfer their stock? Or will you embrace the alternative of the venerable Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] and fill it up and block it forever against the commerce of the country? If that Senator had the will and the power to consummate so great a wrong, the good deeds of a long life would be a poor offset to the ruin he had wrought. But I will not pretend to believe that the Senator was serious. His eminent public services and his love of justice would make him recoil with horror from dealing so deadly a blow. His very nature would prompt him to extend a helping hand to the honest laborer, to lighten his burdens, to send joy and peace to his home and his family, rather than to destroy all hopes of comfort by closing their approaches to a market.

Are Senators aware of the extent of the obstructions to commerce that we are seeking to remove? Have they studied the mineral resources of Pennsylvania and West Virginia and the agricultural and mechanical industries of Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois? Who will enumerate their productions and assign their values? And yet the producers and consumers of that extensive and fertile valley are to be perplexed by vexatious delays and catterwauled and plundered by exorbitant and oppressive tolls and charges until Kentucky does a thing which she has done already, and which she could not undo even if she desired it, and which, if carried out with all its force to the last extremity, would not justify this Government in assuming an attitude of neglect and indifference to so large and so respectable a portion of its citizens. Ascending boats bound to Louisville fail to go to Louisville, and their cargoes of grain, tobacco, and groceries are rolled out on the Portland wharf, and remain exposed to the damages of the weather and to the depredations of man and beast until they can be carted to their destination, while passengers find such conveyance as they may to the city. These multitudinous hardships and oppressions have built up four cities at the Falls of the Ohio—two in Indiana and two in Kentucky.

An embargo or a tax which would incumber and embarrass the foreign commerce of Boston would be a serious affliction upon the people of New England; but the injury would not be so great in amount nor so wide-spread in its operation as that which is here imposed upon the West.

In behalf, then, of the Commonwealth of Kentucky and those other great Commonwealths whose citizens have borne these grievances for years, I invite you to take your property and execute the important trust committed to your keeping. Nobody will interfere with your jurisdiction, and everybody will thank you for the benefits and blessings of free navigation.

I hope that the committee of conference will be ordered. I have asked little at the hands of this Senate, and I trust that this just demand will not be disregarded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the bill, with the amendments of the House of Representatives, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING. I do, if the Senator from Michigan will accept that motion in lieu of his.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly; I accept it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was in hopes that without further delay the Senate would consent to refer this matter to a committee of conference; but if there is to be any reference to a standing committee it ought to be to the committee that originated the bill, the Committee on Finance. That committee, representing all sections of the country, undoubtedly can consider the question which is now presented by what is called the Wheeler amendment; and if the Senator from New York has no objection, I will move to refer the amendment of the House to the Committee on Finance, which reported the bill. That is the usual course.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no wish to engage in a competition between committees, and certainly I have none to participate in the labor necessary to an investigation of these questions. The Senator from Ohio the other day showed, and again now shows, that his understanding is that the House of Representatives has adopted one amendment which he calls the Wheeler amendment. So the other day when the bill was considered I thought; and it shows how little advised we are on this subject. It turns out now that four or five amendments have been adopted by the House. It turns out that they were adopted with such disposition on the part of some of those having charge of the bill as led them to refrain from attempting to perfect it, and the bill as it now stands is quite incongruous, as the Senate will see if it shall be read at length with the amendments which have been introduced. Upon these four or five amendments and upon the original bill, I find on looking at it further several serious questions arise; I believe all of them questions of law. Had I known as well as I do now the situation of the case, I might on Friday have made a much fuller statement of the question than I did make. Beyond the question of taxation there are others equally grave, going to the ownership of the canal and the effect of the preceding legislation. My judgment is, I say to the Senator from Kentucky, who seemed to think that a motion to refer was made in the interest of delay, that the most certain, the most expeditious, and the most convenient mode of disposing of the measure is to allow the proper law committee of the Senate to investigate these questions and make report on them. I have no wish certainly to oust the Committee on Finance of the jurisdiction of this subject; but as the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] said, in the distribution of the business of the Senate, this certainly did not belong to the Committee on Finance, although, as the chairman explained, some communications of the Secretary of the Treasury having been referred to that committee, the committee of course was not to blame for taking jurisdiction of it; but it belonged originally to the Committee on Commerce; it came from the Committee on Commerce of the other House. It comes here now with several questions which are substantially questions of law, and there being on the Judiciary Committee one of the Senators from Ohio, and he being a very eminent lawyer and being very warmly in favor of the freedom of the Louisville and Portland Canal and the commerce that passes through it, it seemed to me that that was a wise disposition, and therefore I asked the Senator from Michigan to yield his motion and allow this to be put in its stead, which he has consented to do. If the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] does not wish the question to be taken on that motion, I will release the Senator from Michigan from his promise to consent to my motion, and we will let it go back and vote on the motion to refer to the Committee on Commerce or to any other committee which Senators choose to name. I say in the interest espoused by those Senators that my belief is confidently that we shall get the best bill in the shortest time if we allow it to take the ordinary course of legal questions which arise in the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I do not think it has been usual in this Senate to take a bill out of the hands of the committee that reported it and send it to another committee. We had that subject up the other day in the Senate, and no instance was stated in which such a thing had been done, except where the committee reporting the bill itself requested it to be done. This bill was reported by the Committee on Finance; it was advocated by that committee in the Senate; it passed as reported by that committee; and when it comes back into the Senate with an amendment from the House of Representatives, according to the courtesy due to that committee and the usage of the Senate, if it should be referred at all, it ought to be referred to that committee in which it originated.

In respect to the suggestion of the Senator from New York that that was not the proper committee in the first instance, I beg leave to differ with him most materially in opinion. This not a question that properly belongs to the Committee on Commerce; it is more than anything else a question of finance. The question really is—the substantial question at the bottom of all this is; the question in relation to which all other qusestions are but mere machinery is—what shall be the amount of toll received on this canal. Is that not a financial question? The entire stock of the canal company with the exception of $500 is owned by the Government of the United States, and those $500, as I can show by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, are only held by five individuals, because they were requested nearly twenty years ago by the then Secretary of the Treasury, to act as trustees for the United States. The question is, then, what tolls shall we levy on the passage of vessels through our own property? and that is very properly a question of finance. But whether that be so or not this subject has been before that committee and the bill originated in that committee, and courtesy to the committee and the usage of the Senate require that if there be a re-reference it shall be to that committee.

One word more and I will not occupy more time upon this subject, for although I have looked into this matter since last Friday, and believe I am now prepared to speak upon every statute that ever was passed in relation to it either by Congress or by the Legislature of Kentucky and am greatly confirmed in the opinion expressed by me last Friday and which I know I could express more fully to-day if we had the matter up, I do not want to take time. I have therefore only to reply to the other suggestion of the Senator from New York, that there are important legal questions involved in this bill. Why, sir, suppose there are, as was truly said by the Senator from Indiana the other day; is every bill involving legal questions, or even important legal questions, to be sent to the Judiciary Committee? If so, you will have to enlarge the Judiciary Committee three or four fold and allow it to do work by sections, for it would absorb nearly the whole business of the Senate. How many important legal questions come before the Committee on Claims? They come by the hundred—I might almost say by the thousand. How many come before the Committee on Private Land Claims? How many before the Committee on Commerce, relating to tariffs and the like? And so on with all the committees of this body; there is not one before which a legal question may not come; and therefore our committees are well constituted. Take the Committee on Finance; there are on it three or four of the ablest lawyers in the Senate, quite as competent to decide this question as any members of the Judiciary Committee. Here is my colleague, [Mr. SHERMAN,] the chairman of that committee. Here is the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT;] there is the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] who also belongs to the Judiciary Committee; and there is the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] Where will you find any better lawyers? And what necessity is there to take from a committee containing such lawyers as these a bill which that committee originated, simply because there are legal questions involved in the bill?

Mr. President, if a reference is to be had now, which I do not think ought to be had, but out of deference to the opinions expressed by some Senators I am willing it may be had, I hope the usage of the Senate will not be departed from by taking the bill from the committee to which it belongs and which heretofore has reported it.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have never said in the course of my service in the Senate a word on the subject of this Louisville and Portland Canal, and I almost reproach myself that I have not said something about it. I have no doubt I should have been able, if I had ever known anything about it, to speak intelligently. I want to state now that I will vote for the first reference that is submitted for a vote, I do not care to what committee it is, whether to a committee of conference, to the Committee on Commerce, or the Committee on Finance. The one thing I want to avoid is any further delay in doing what seems to be the main purpose of the bill, and that is to require the United States to take possession of this great work and protect the enormous commerce which it was designed to benefit.

We have been told here a dozen times, which I am sorry to say the history of the country verifies, that ever since 1855 five men, with a vested interest of $500, have held control of this great work, in which there appears to have been invested some $10,000,000, and that they are collecting now annually from two to three hundred thousand dollars, and have been collecting for all these twenty years not so large a sum as that, but a sum constantly increasing. What they have done with that money we do not know and no one in this Chamber is prepared to tell.

I think under these circumstances, the United States itself having invested every one of those dollars except the five hundred, it is high time the United States took control of the work, if it can get control of it peaceably by paying the $500, or by ordering the Army and Navy to take forcible control. It is time to have control. It is said we shall buy a lawsuit. We paid for a first-class lawsuit, and I think it is time the dance commenced. It is said that the State of Kentucky is claiming the right to tax this work. Perhaps Kentucky has the right to tax the work; but I think we had better take possession and try the question whether she has the right to tax or not. It is said there are some heirs of somebody or other who claims title to this thing. I think we had better put ourselves in a position to try that claim of title. We can abandon the work next year or twenty years hence if we find we cannot hold it; but I think, having put so many millions into the work, we had better try the question whether we can hold it or not.

I would as soon this matter should go to a committee of conference as to any other committee. I am quite as willing it should go to the Committee on Finance. I want to say one word, however, having looked a little into the subject. I hope whatever committee takes jurisdiction now will provide as little machinery as possible. We have made an appropriation heretofore, I learn, for paying off a mortgage. Mr. President, think of that one feature in the legislation on this subject. In 1860 I am told—I have not looked at the act; I looked for it, but the volume of the Statutes in which that act is did not happen to be on my shelf—in 1860 I am told the Congress of the United States authorized these five men to put a mortgage on the canal, and they did it for the sum of $1,700,000 or thereabouts.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now reduced to $1,100,000.

Mr. HOWE. They mortgaged your work for which you paid every dollar that had been paid, except $500. They executed the mortgage; they sold the bonds. Who can tell what they got for them; who can tell what they did with the money? But you have now made an appropriation to pay off that mortgage. I think it ought to be paid off. I do not know of anything in our legislation which is worse than that one fact of your authorizing individuals to mortgage such a piece of public property as that. Why, sir, if you were to allow any five men in the District of Columbia to mortgage your Capitol to-day, I would not think one whit worse of that act than I do of this. But you made an appropriation to pay off that mortgage. That I think is enough. There is a clause in this bill, I believe, which contemplates authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to settle outstanding indebtedness beyond that. I hope when the bill comes before us for final action there will be no such authority vested in the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator that the whole amount is thirty or forty thousand dollars, made up of small balances on running accounts.

Mr. HOWE. I do not care if it is but three shillings and sixpence, I would not allow the Secretary of the Treasury to settle a claim of the kind. I do not know how much authority these five men have, besides mortgaging your canal, to contract indebtedness for which they have given no mortgage and to make the Treasury of the United States responsible. Let those who have claims against this work present them hereafter and we consider them. If they are honest and fair charges against the work, the United States will do right by them; but I would not allow any officer of the Government to settle up until the claims are preferred here and we know exactly what they are. I see that some edition of the bill also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to take possession. Clearly, it seems to me, the Secretary of War should do that.

Mr. THURMAN. The House bill is "the Secretary of War."

Mr. HOWE. I understand that the House changed that. The Secretary of War should do that. He has the only officers who are competent to manage it. The Engineer Corps should have charge of it, it seems to me. They are the only officers who can do it. I hope some such bill as that, containing as few provisions as possible, will be presented at the earliest day, and that we may agree to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. All similar bills to this have heretofore been referred to the Committee on Commerce, and I believe that every appropriation ever made for this work has been recommended by the Committee on Commerce. It is claimed that there are $1,000,000,000 of commerce passing through or by this canal in a year. If there is any measure specially belonging to the Committee on Commerce, I should suppose that this was the particular one, and how it ever got into the hands of the Committee on Finance I do not know; but it has now become purely a legal question. If the Committee on Commerce for the last five or six years has been under a misapprehension; if Kentucky has not yielded absolute right to the Government of the United States over this canal, I think we ought to know that. I accepted the suggestion of the Senator from New York because I want the legal opinion of our legal advisers, elected for that very purpose. When a matter of law as to some point in a bill before the Committee on Commerce arises, and the advice of the law committee is needed, we have always been in the habit of referring that particular point to the Committee on the Judiciary. I, for one, want their judgment, and their united judgment, on this point. Hence I think the bill ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I think this matter ought not to go to a committee of conference. In view of what I have heard, I think there is one question to be examined, and that is what property the United States has actually in this canal. It seems that the Louisville and Portland Canal was originally built by an incorporated company, and the Government of the United States purchased certain shares in the stock of that corporation. I have no doubt it was perfectly competent for the United States to do that; but the question may arise, what property the United States is competent to take in any corporation or in any work or enterprise within the jurisdiction of the States of this Union. It may acquire property for certain specific purposes enumerated in the Constitution of the United States, for the purpose of building forts, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful governmental buildings; but the question may very gravely arise, is it competent for the United States, even by the cession of any State in this Union, to acquire property within the jurisdiction and within the eminent domain of a State for any other purpose than the purposes expressly designated and nominated in the Constitution itself? The provision of the Constitution to which I refer specifies that—

> The Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings.

I say it may be a very grave question whether the United States can acquire property within the jurisdiction of a State of this Union for any other purpose than the purposes specified in that clause of the Constitution. This suggestion of mine is not novel; it has been held to be correct by eminent judges of the Supreme Court, or at least by one. In the case of Searight vs. Stokes et al., which arose out of the cession by the United States of the Cumberland road to Pennsylvania and Ohio, Mr. Justice Daniel, who delivered an opinion, expressly declared that in his judgment the Federal Government could not acquire property in a State. He said:

> I hold, then, that neither Congress nor the Federal Government in the exercise of all or any of its powers or attributes possesses the power to construct roads, nor any other description of what have been called internal improvements, within the limits of the States. That the territory and soil of the several States appertain to them by title paramount to the Constitution, and cannot be taken, save with the exceptions of those portions thereof which might be ceded for the seat of the Federal Government and for sites permitted to be purchased for forts, arsenals, dock-yards, &c.—3 Howard's Reports, page 180.

There was the opinion of a very eminent judge as to the incapacity of the United States to take and hold property for any other purposes than the purposes specified and enumerated in the clause of the Constitution to which I have referred. Therefore I think this bill ought to go to some committee, and ought to be thoroughly investigated; and the question to which I have referred especially demands the consideration of some committee of this body, so that we may act intelligently before we attempt to take possession of property within the limits of the State of Kentucky, or to expend the money of the Government upon it.

I simply rose to call attention to this question as one which in my opinion proves the urgent necessity of a reference of this measure to some committee to investigate the question rather than that it shall go to a committee of conference.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Chair if my motion is pending to refer to the Committee on Finance?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion pending is the motion of the Senator from Michigan, as modified, to refer the bill and amendment to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend by striking out "the Judiciary" and inserting "Finance."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on that amendment.

Mr. CAMERON. I think this matter should go to the Judiciary Committee. The question now involved is altogether to my mind a question of law. This canal has cost the Government a great deal of money, mainly because the Government of the United States cannot manage economically any work of this kind. No canal, no railroad, no other public work can be managed by a Government like ours that has so many individuals in its employment. This canal was made originally by the subscriptions of individuals and by an appropriation I think of $500,000 by the Government. It was a part of Mr. Clay's great system of internal improvements, the same system which attempted to make a turnpike road from the Chesapeake to the Mississippi River, and which also intended to make canals all over the United States. Surveys were made by the Government about the same time all over the country, which ended with the surveys, but those surveys cost the Government a great deal of money. My experience in connection with works of internal improvement by the States is that they cost much more money than they would if constructed by individuals. Rather than have this canal owned by the United States, I would give it to the State of Kentucky, as in the case of the national road; after constructing it we ceded it to the States through which it ran. It would be their interest to keep the tolls at a proper rate, and they would not be allowed by public opinion to charge too much. We have paid since this canal was completed, I understand, something like $5,000,000 already for keeping it in repair. If you take the whole charge of it into the hands of the Government you will expend millions of dollars every year, and it will be a source of corruption as well as of expenditure.

I trust we shall have the bill sent to a committee that will investigate the affair properly; let us understand what rights we have in it; and that can only be done, as I believe, by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should be very much opposed to this matter going to a committee of conference. That is a mode of legislation which will answer when you are in an exigency. I really suppose that the question here is the title of the United States to this property. That is the question; and it does seem to me that that question of title, being purely legal, ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary; and I am confirmed in that opinion by the fact that I know the Judiciary Committee would at once refer this subject to a sub-committee, consisting of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and probably the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] who has taken some interest in this subject, and there would be no delay, but that reference could be made at once, and then we could be informed as to that question of title. I think that is the proper direction for this matter to take.

Mr. THURMAN. I must express my astonishment that a bill which originated in the Finance Committee should be taken out, or an attempt be made to take it out, of the hands of that committee, on the ground that there are some legal questions involved in it, when there are on that committee such lawyers as the chairman, [Mr. SHERMAN,] the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT,] the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] and the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] What better lawyers do you want than they to consider this legal question? It does seem to me that it is not the business of the Judiciary Committee to sit as a high court of errors upon the other committees of this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of Friday last, which is the financial bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. My colleague gives way, and I hope we shall now have a vote and settle this matter one way or the other.

Mr. WRIGHT. If a vote can be taken at once, I shall make no objection, but if this matter is to be debated further, I must insist on proceeding with the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the unfinished business will be laid aside informally.

Mr. CONKLING. Is the motion to refer to a committee of conference still pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion as it now stands is the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] to refer the bill with the House amendment to the Committee on Commerce, modified by his consent by adopting the suggestion of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Thereupon the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] moves to amend the motion so as to refer to the Committee on Finance instead of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING. And what has become of the motion pending to refer to a committee of conference?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was superseded by a motion to refer to a standing committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Finance will allow this bill to go to the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not see that it will make a particle of difference; and there is some little idea on the part of many Senators that the matter was improperly referred in the first instance to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there was an oppressive tax of fifty cents a ton on all the commerce of New England and New York, which my honorable friend was desirous to get rid of, I think he would take that course which he thought best calculated to get rid of it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. But I think we can get rid of it quite as quickly by referring it to the Committee on the Judiciary as by referring it to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the bill was originated in the Committee on Finance, reported and considered there fully, and we have it here now with a substitute pending. I would be willing to refer it to any committee that would settle the matter quickest; but it seems to me it ought to be referred to the Committee on Finance, because they already understand it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly two of the ablest lawyers in this body have expressed a difference as to where the title to this property lies. It is well known to every member of the Senate that you never expend one dollar in the erection of a light-house, a marine hospital, or a post-office until the State has given up the right of eminent domain. Do we, or do we not, own that right in this canal? That is the question, and it is the only question, and a purely legal question. Now I desire the opinion of the ablest lawyers we have here on that point, and it is presumable that those were selected and placed on the Committee on the Judiciary. I want their opinion on a legal point, and I hope the Senate will send the matter to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

AMERICAN REGISTER TO PERUVIAN STEAMSHIP.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I was requested by a member of the House in the absence of the Senators from Massachusetts—the Senator now present [Mr. BOUTWELL] is unable to take any part in business—to ask the Senate to take up a bill merely changing the name of a vessel that has already passed the House and been reported back by our committee with a slight amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think we had better go on with the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa objects, and the unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I appeal to the Senator from Iowa to allow this little bill to pass. Under the circumstances I think he cannot object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa insist on his objection?

Mr. WRIGHT. I will yield in this instance, but I give notice that I shall yield to nothing else. I withdraw the objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2186) granting an American registry to the American-built Peruvian steamship Rayo, now rebuilt in the United States and converted into a sailing-vessel.

The bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American certificate of registry to the American-built Peruvian steamship Rayo, wrecked in foreign waters, and purchased, rebuilt, and changed into a sailing-vessel by citizens of the United States within the United States, to be registered by the name of Star of the West, or other proper name.

The Committee on Commerce reported the bill with an amendment to strike out the words "or other proper name" at the end of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CURRENCY AND BANKING.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 617) to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes and for free banking; the pending question being on the substitute of Mr. MERRIMON.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I understand that while there has been no final action, nevertheless the action of the Senate upon the bill thus far has indicated a purpose to retain the first section as it was adopted; that the second and fourth sections have been struck from the bill and also the third perhaps, and the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina has been substituted for that section of the bill that provides for bank circulation upon the basis of New York; and that the fourth and fifth sections of the bill as reported by the committee are retained. So that, substantially, the vote of the Senate indicates a purpose to have $400,000,000 of greenbacks, to add $46,000,000 to the bank circulation, to make provision for a retention of a portion of the reserve in the banks in gold, and a final provision that the debt of the Government shall not be increased by this bill or anything under it.

These conclusions, so far as they can be regarded as conclusions, have not been arrived at without a very great struggle and not a little discussion. On the first day of this session two resolutions were introduced, the one by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] and the other by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] upon this subject of finance. Almost immediately thereafter the discussion commenced upon the general question. Soon thereafter a resolution was reported from a majority of the Committee on Finance, accompanied by a resolution by two members of that committee, and also by a third resolution from one member of the committee. Soon after that the chairman of the Committee on Finance reported a bill which led also to discussion, and thus the discussion continued until some two weeks since the bill now before the Senate was reported by the committee, and thus it has occurred that four months of our time have passed, and three-fourths of that time have been occupied in the discussion of this general question. I think some one said—last week perhaps—that if any one had said of us or of Congress that we would adjourn for the holidays without passing some bill upon this subject, he would have been regarded as a false prophet.

While I recognize the importance of the subject to the people, and the necessity for the very greatest and utmost care upon it, it seems to me that the discussion is about exhausted, if it can be said that discussion upon any subject in this Senate is exhausted. The chairman of the committee on Friday, about the time we were adjourning, asked for an adjournment until this morning, hoping that something might be agreed upon, so that we could all substantially come together and dispose of this question to-day. Whether he has framed anything that will tend to bring about this result I know not; but whether he has or not, what I want to say and what I want to appeal to the Senate to do is this: Every day that we have been in session there has been one appeal after another to Congress to settle this question. Everywhere the people feel it to be a matter of more importance that we shall settle it perhaps than the manner of settling it. We have had discussions here, and discussions have taken place all over the nation. At this time perhaps more than at any other since we met, the people throughout the country are demanding the settlement of this question. Men everywhere, North and South, East and West, are arranging for their business in the spring and the coming summer months. Everywhere they feel that it is important to the business interests of the country that the question should be settled. The chairman of the committee has appealed to us more than once to settle and determine it, and get it out of the way. Two-thirds of the session in all probability have passed, and still it is undetermined. Many and very grave questions remain to be determined by the Senate. There is no expectation that we shall be required to remain, or that we will remain, here beyond the first days of June. Certainly only three months at most remain of this session. Now I appeal to all Senators here, whether they be inflationists or expansionists, so called, or be contractionists, or whatever their names, whether they believe that our greenbacks belong to the so-called depreciated currency, the irredeemable currency, the non-convertible currency—I believe I have heard those terms used here—or whether they believe that it is the best currency we have had, to remain here and let us dispose of this question to-day. I can see no reason for delay. None occurs to me. I do not see how there is the least necessity for it.

If my good friend, the chairman of the committee, will lead us to-day to a disposition of the question, whether he be a friend to the bill or not, I shall be an humble follower, and with all the zeal that I can bring to bear upon the question I propose to stand by him. If he feels that the bill has assumed such a form, or shall assume such a form, that he cannot support it, then I trust that he will not interpose an objection to the disposition of the question.

I therefore say that so far as I am concerned, as a member of the Committee on Finance, while the bill in all its features as it now stands has not my approval, yet believing that the true philosophy of action here always demands of me, as it should of every one, if I cannot secure all that I desire, to come as near it as possible, I intend to support it. If the chairman of the committee shall not insist upon a vote to-day, I trust that the friends of the business of the Senate, those anxious to get this question out of the way, those anxious to get at something else, will at least agree with me upon the propriety and necessity for action to-day, and that our friends who believe that this measure is now in as nearly good form as we can probably get it will unite, feeling that they owe it to the country to dispose of this question in saying, "We will stand by it and remain here to-day until the question is disposed of." I believe this is due to the business of the Senate to come; I believe it is due to us; I believe it is due to the people of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert a substitute.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina the object of the first branch of this amendment, observing as I do that it stands in the precise words now making the text of the first section of the bill?

Mr. MERRIMON. The bill has been so amended as to adopt exactly the language of the two sections that I offer as a substitute; but the bill, as perfected, contains two sections more than the substitute. The purpose of my motion now is to wipe out the bill entirely and let the substitute take its place.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator then considers his motion equivalent to moving to strike out the remaining sections of the bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, with due respect to the Senator from North Carolina, it seems to me his proposition is in a very unusual shape. Here is a bill, or rather what is left of a bill, now before the Senate of four sections; the first fixing a maximum amount of Treasury notes; the second providing for an increase of bank currency to be issued under the act of July 12, 1870, the intention of which is to provide a more equitable distribution of the banking currency; the third providing an exceedingly important restriction upon the operation of the national banks under the present system; and the fourth providing against any increase of the principal of the public debt of the United States. It seems so plain a way to reach the end desired by moving to strike out the last two sections of the bill, that I do not understand why the honorable Senator from North Carolina clings to his more roundabout, indirect method of inserting a substitute for the four sections, which substitute consists ipsissima verba of the language of the first two sections of the bill.

But, sir, whether the end shall be reached by striking out the last two sections of the bill, or by the other method of a substitute keeping in the first two sections only, I still trust it will not prevail. The amendment that I have proposed to the Senate, and which lies in printed form upon the desks of Senators, was intended to signify my opposition to a continuance or to an increase of the national banking system. I believe it to have been an expedient struck out in war times. I believe it to have been an expedient of very doubtful constitutional power on the part of the United States Government; and I have seen nothing in the world of the banking system that has made me believe that it is better for the banks and for the Government, and still more important for the people of the country, that the national system should be increased in its operations. Therefore it was that I proposed an amendment relieving the issues of the State banks from the destructive tax that was put upon them for the purpose of annihilating those institutions.

The reason for imposing a tax of 10 per cent. passed away when a sufficient subscription to the loans of the Government had been reached through the banks themselves. When they had once been compelled to call in or dispose of the basis of their banking capital and to renew it in the shape of subscriptions to the United States loans, the end had been reached for which the bill was designed, and it ought never to have been pushed further. It was taking from the States those rights of local self-government which are essential to them as the means of rectifying abuses to which from time to time they may be subjected, and was an invasion of that great principle of local self-government which I am satisfied is the very nursery of constitutional liberty in this country.

By taking this tax from the issues of the State banks I have no idea that inflation to any extent can follow, for this reason: In the first place, whatever may be said of the powers of the Federal Government, and however men may differ as to the construction to be given to the later decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon behalf of the power of Congress in time of war, much more than in time of peace, to make paper money a legal tender for the payment of debts, no one can doubt that the language of the Constitution is explicit and direct that no State can make anything but gold and silver a legal tender for the payment of debts, and therefore promissory notes issued by institutions created under State law can never surpass the power which originated them, and as the State cannot make anything but gold and silver a legal tender for debts, so no bank created by a State could make its paper money a legal tender for the payment of debts, but it must be convertible into gold and silver upon demand and at the request of the holder by the bank that issues it. Now, that a bank should issue its paper at the present time, redeemable in gold and silver, would be a solecism not to be expected, and I cannot suppose, therefore, that, except in that emergency in which the demand for currency shall be such as to make the value of currency exceed the difference between paper and gold, any institution wisely governed, governed by the common laws of self-preservation, would issue paper that it was not prepared to redeem in gold.

Nor do I believe that a currency issued by State banks would compare in usefulness, in value, to the currency issued by the United States Government. The one has an area of circulation and a value for purposes of exchange totally denied to the issues of the local institutions; but the local institution has this merit, the value of which I cannot shake from my mind, and which I confess I desire to see the rural population, whom I chiefly represent, have the benefit of at least attempting in case of necessity. It is that a note of circumscribed circulation issued by a bank will lose its credit as it leaves the place of its issue, and therefore losing credit will return again and will be kept within a narrow space of circulation that will enable those who do give it credit, to whom the credit of those who issue it is well known and established, to have the benefit of a circulating medium in those periods of panic and demand from the money centers when notes which will pass current at those money centers are called away either by the emergencies of speculation or of legitimate or illegitimate business.

I have said that I did not desire to see by act of Congress an extension of the national banking system, nor do I; but at the same time I am equally unwilling to disturb vested interests so important to the country as are now involved in the existence of the national banks. I propose to let those banks stand, but by the policy of the Government to force the Treasury of the United States from the system of distribution of this currency which has caused such results as we see. So long as these banks, however, are to exist, (and that shall be a question of their own pleasure, for I would not withdraw the charter or the facility which is given under existing laws to those already chartered,) I would simply allow an opportunity for issuing circulation to be restored upon due occasion to other banks under the old system under which our country was so prosperous, under which men were taught to govern themselves, and to govern themselves in this most important matter of controlling their own financial troubles.

One of the sections proposed to be stricken out, either directly or indirectly, by the motion of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] does contain wholesome restrictions upon present practices on the part of the national banks of the country, who are in the habit of considering in their reserves the entire balances which they have intrusted upon interest to the banks in the money centers. I consider the features of the third section of the bill exceedingly wholesome; they propose to abolish an abuse, which is the banks becoming the borrowers of money by paying interest on balances intrusted to their charge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. BAYARD. I shall have to take the occasion of some other amendment to express my views. The remarks I have just made have been on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to substitute his proposition in place of the bill as amended.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish the Secretary would give us the number of the remaining sections of the bill which will be stricken out if the motion of the Senator from North Carolina prevails. I know what they are, but I want it to appear on the record. I do not care to have them read, but I want to have stated the sections upon which this motion is intended to operate, although it is not leveled at them ostensibly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The statement will be made.

The CHIEF CLERK. The sections in the original bill were numbered 5 and 6. In the bill as amended they are 3 and 4.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that they may be read, that we may see what it is proposed to strike out.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That each national banking association now organized, or hereafter to be organized, shall keep and maintain as a part of its reserve required by law one-fourth part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits; and that hereafter only one-fourth of the reserve now prescribed by law for national banking associations shall consist of balances due to an association available for the redemption of its circulating notes from associations in cities of redemption, and upon which balances no interest shall be paid.

SEC. 4. That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any increase of the principal of the public debt of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I inquire also whether it be true that the sections preceding those read, as they stand, are word for word the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They are.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does seem to me that in the consideration of so important a bill Senators under their responsibility ought to proceed directly and clearly to what they intend to do. The motion of the Senator from North Carolina is a motion to strike out the fifth and sixth sections of the original bill. That is all there is of it. All this attempt to obscure motions by offering substitutes or moving to strike out a whole section of the bill and to offer another section with a single word altered in lieu of it, or this proposition to offer a substitute for the whole bill merely to reach directly the question of striking out the fifth and sixth sections of the bill, it seems to me is something unusual, and it is practiced in this debate and as to this bill to an extent that I have never before seen. But, sir, we are not children here playing with toys. We know the motion of the Senator from North Carolina is a motion to strike out the fifth and sixth sections of the bill. That is all there is of it. The fifth section was reported by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Finance. It was agreed upon in pursuance of a universal demand both of contractionists and inflationists. It was reported to secure some little coin in each bank, with a hope that ultimately it might increase to an amount sufficient to maintain specie payments. That portion of the section which permits only one-fourth of the reserve, instead of three-fifths of the reserve, to be deposited in the redemption cities, has been demanded in every city of the West, in every place where an inflation resolution has been offered. Everybody knows that the reason of the trouble in September was that three-fifths of all the reserve, both on deposits and circulation, of the banks of the Western States were in the city of New York, and being involved in the speculations of New York, by the panic were suddenly made unavailable for business purposes in the West and South. The proposition of the Senator from North Carolina is a proposition in the interest of the national banks, to enable them to deposit a large portion of their reserve in the city of New York, so that they may derive interest from it in the city of New York and disable themselves from loaning money in their neighborhood. I had always supposed that the Senators who were opposed to this bill, and especially that the Senators who desired to strengthen the West and South, were especially desirous to have the reserves held at home, so that the banks would be compelled, if they loaned them at all, to loan them to the people at home, and not to the bulls and bears of New York City.

I simply rose, because I do not wish to prolong this debate, to state to the Senate distinctly that this motion now is nothing but a motion to strike out the fifth and sixth sections of the bill, and that these sections were agreed to in committee nem. con. in accordance with a universal demand, with a view to strengthen the banks in their reserves at home and to substitute in the reserves a small modicum of gold, only $6,000,000 a year, with a view ultimately to a redemption in coin. But striking out the sixth section impliedly gives authority to increase the principal of the public debt.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Senator from Ohio will pardon me for saying that I am astonished at his declaration just made that there should be any insincerity in offering the substitute which is now before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say "insincerity."

Mr. MERRIMON. The bill as it has been perfected is one proposition, and a proposition entirely and materially distinct from the substitute. It is true that the substitute is in precisely the same words as the first and second sections of the bill as now amended; but those two sections are materially affected by the third and fourth sections of the bill as it now stands before the Senate; and the bill, I repeat, makes a proposition entirely distinct from that which is contained in the substitute. The purpose of those who desire an increase of the currency to the amount fixed by the two sections embraced by the substitute is a plain and simple one, untrammeled by anything else; and if we can ascertain anything from the action of the Senate, the purpose of the majority is to have the proposition pass the Senate in this simple manner so that there can be no question or controversy about it in the other branch of Congress, here or elsewhere. When this bill shall have been passed in this shape, when the country shall have had the benefit of the increased circulation of United States notes and of bank-notes, then it will be time enough for those who desire amendments to the national currency law to propose them to the Senate, have them acted upon, and pass a bill which will accomplish those ends.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator how that result will ensue from his motion any more than it would from the simple motion to strike out the two remaining sections of the bill?

Mr. MERRIMON. It will do it in this way: If the friends of an increase of the currency shall allow their proposition to be encumbered by the third and fourth sections of the bill as amended, and by the various amendments proposed by the Senator from Ohio and other gentlemen, it will bring on a discussion, it will excite a diversity of opinion that may defeat the whole bill. A majority are agreed on the substitute, and I desire for one that it shall be adopted, and thus put an end to the controversy so far as the increase is concerned.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it not undoubtedly true now under the rule adopted three or four days ago, that every motion which would be in order to perfect the remaining sections after a mere motion to strike out is in order now pending the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, which is to strike out and insert? If that be true, how can the Senator contend that there is any substantial purpose in making a motion disguised—I do not say intentionally—in the form submitted by the Senator in place of the most palpable motion to strike out the two sections which he wishes to get rid of.

Mr. MERRIMON. My object, I state to the Senator frankly—and I did not suppose anybody could misunderstand that—is to have the bill pass the Senate with the two sections contained in the substitute.

Mr. CONKLING. Then why not simply move to strike out the others?

Mr. MERRIMON. I believe that what I have just stated is the desire of a majority of the Senate as indicated by the votes heretofore taken. In my judgment this is more convenient than the other way. It is the difference "'twixt tweedledum and tweedledee." It seemed to me this was the plainer manner of accomplishing the same end. I cannot see that anybody is prejudiced by this course. If the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from New York, or anywhere else, shall desire to offer measures perfecting the bill, it is perfectly competent for them to do it; they are not cut off from any right or privilege; but the substitute is a simple, plain proposition, the first section of which, unaffected by any other provision whatsoever in any other section in the bill which we propose to pass, increases the greenback circulation of the country to $400,000,000; and the second section authorizes an increase of the national-bank currency under existing laws to $400,000,000 if the country shall demand it. There are the two simple propositions. I state frankly that I desire that these two propositions shall pass the Senate unaffected by any other provision whatsoever, so that the country may have at once the benefit of this increased circulation. If anything has been ascertained by the long debate that we have had in the Senate and the various votes taken, it is that an increase shall be had, and to that amount. My proposition is simply to increase the circulation to that amount under existing laws, so that there can be no controversy here or elsewhere about it. I do not desire to see anything appended to it, nor do I desire to see anything further offered as an amendment to it, although I recognize the right of every Senator on this floor to offer amendments as long as he will. I claim the right, however, to vote against these propositions as they may be presented, one by one, and I trust those who actually desire a simple increase of the circulation will vote with me to reject every such proposition.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, if it were polite and parliamentary to do so there would be no difficulty in assigning one explanation to this motion. If it could possibly be (which of course I do not mean to intimate) that Senators are acting in reference to what may take place when somebody shall be arraigned before some other tribunal, all this would be plain. If it could be that Senators hesitate to move or to vote to strike out distinctly and plainly, so that it may be seen of all men, a safeguard requiring a reserve, and that, therefore, they want to accomplish the same purpose by circumlocution, by indirection, not so manifest in its effect to the public eye, that would explain the proceeding in which we are engaged. I repeat that I do not feel at liberty to ascribe such motives or such purposes to any member of the Senate. Therefore, I am utterly at a loss to know why it is that when the Senate in Committee of the Whole has stricken out the first two sections of a bill and placed in their stead certain words so that those words constitute the entire bill, except that they are followed by two original sections still remaining, in lieu of the manifest and easy way of divesting the bill of all except the first two sections, a motion should be made to strike out the whole bill and to put back the very words which have been placed there already.

Mr. MERRIMON. Less two sections.

Mr. CONKLING. Had my honorable friend from North Carolina followed the statement which I made, he would not have interposed the qualification "less two sections." The aim of my statement was to bring to the notice of the Senate that the bill now contains two sections which have been put there by a majority vote in Committee of the Whole. It contains nothing else except two following sections. The Senator from North Carolina wishes to rid himself of those sections and dismiss them. In place of making that motion he moves to strike out the whole bill, thereby meaning those two sections, and two which precede them, and then to put back in the very words half of that which he strikes out.

I cannot refrain from saying again that if it were the purpose to obscure this proceeding, to cover it up, to obfuscate the general gaze, this would be plain if some Senator felt that he might ever in future need to say, "I did not vote to strike out the section requiring a reserve; the record shows no such thing as that; I merely voted to strike out the whole bill, be the same more or less, and to put in these two sections." If I could suppose that this was to pave the way to an immunity like that, that it was to furnish a door of escape from any responsibility hereafter for striking out or striking down the provision about reserve, as I say, it would all be plain. But as I am not at liberty to entertain such a suggestion, as I do not mean to impute it to anybody, this seems to me the most circular process that I ever happened to see in the Senate, the most curious way of going around and coming out precisely where you go in. I should be glad if without interfering with the convenience of others we might at some time get a vote on the simple question whether we shall dispense with all reserves and prostrate everything like safeguard in setting up these two sections.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I believe under the modification of the rule adopted a few days ago it is now in order to move to perfect as well the part proposed to be inserted as the part proposed to be stricken out. And as I desire with the Senator from New York to secure a direct vote upon the question of the amount of reserves that the national banks shall keep as well as upon the character of the reserves proposed in the section, I move to add to the section proposed to be inserted what is contained in section now numbered 3 in the bill, striking out the word "that" and inserting the word "and," so that it will read:

And each national banking association now organized, or hereafter to be organized, shall keep and maintain, as a part of its reserve required by law, one-fourth part of the coin.

And so on as the section reads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to amend the words proposed to be inserted. The words proposed to be added by him will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the second section of the matter to be inserted the following:

And each national banking association, now organized or hereafter to be organized, shall keep and maintain, as a part of its reserve required by law, one-fourth part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits; and that hereafter only one-fourth of the reserve now prescribed by law for national banking associations shall consist of balances due to an association available for the redemption of its circulating notes from associations in cities of redemption, and upon which balances no interest shall be paid.

Mr. SCOTT. While that section does not entirely meet my view with reference to the amendments that ought to be made of the law requiring reserves to be kept by the national banks, still it is a step in that direction and a step upon which I desire to see a direct vote of the Senate. It will have the effect of requiring the national banks, if I may use that expression, to deposit a nest-egg in the way of accumulating gold, and will further have the effect of keeping in the neighborhoods of the national banks just so much of their reserve as that section prohibits them from sending to the redemption cities and getting interest upon; and this step is in the direction in which all those who have manifested a desire for an increase of local currency have spoken. I can see no objection whatever to this section in this form, and being now offered as an addition to the second section of the substitute proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, it will bring the Senate to a direct vote on that question.

Mr. BAYARD. The amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania exhibits in an additional light the irregularity, the surprising nature of the mode pursued by the Senator from North Carolina to reach the object he desires. If he desires to disentangle this measure as contained in the first two sections from those that follow, why, in the name of all that is usual, does he not move to strike out the objectionable sections?

Mr. MERRIMON. May I ask my honorable friend a question?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. Was not the proposition I made legitimate?

Mr. BAYARD. Candidly, I do not think it was legitimate.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then I ask the Senator to make a question of order. If it is legitimate I cannot see that any one has a right to complain. If it is not legitimate let my honorable friend raise a question of order, and let us settle that.

Mr. BAYARD. I was about, ten minutes ago, to raise a question of order, but the truth is that the motion was so unusual that I was not aware that there was any precedent for it, and I did not know that there could be any precedent against it; but on the basis of that reason for which parliamentary rules were designed, it occurred to me that the amendment was grossly irregular. It is a proposition to amend by striking out and inserting, and it strikes out certain words and then inserts the very words stricken out. That certainly cannot be in order. Now, can that be cured by inserting less and striking out more? In other words, a bill contains, whether five sections or one, a certain number of words; the Senator moves to strike out all and insert say thirty of those words, and those thirty words are in the bill precisely ipsissima verba. He moves to put them in. That certainly would not be in order. Now, can you accomplish indirectly what you have perfectly regular methods of accomplishing directly? A motion to strike out the last two sections of the bill is simple, plain, appreciable. The motion to strike out the whole bill and put the first two sections back as they stand is, as I submit to the Senate, exceedingly inexplicable and awkward and unusual, and this is illustrated still more when you see the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania moving as an amendment to the proposed amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to combine two sections in one. The effect of that is plain, because there was no necessity, perhaps, except for the purpose of orderly consideration, to divide this bill into sections at all. There is nothing in it that could not be contained intelligibly in a single section. Now the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is to incorporate the third section with the second section so that they shall read as one. Now the effect of that upon the measure of the Senator from North Carolina we can understand; but it is not instantly obvious what would become of his motion after that. If the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is adopted, the third section of the bill becomes incorporated in its present language in the second section of the bill, and nothing therefore would be reached by this circuitous route proposed by the Senator from North Carolina but to strike out the fourth section of the bill, for that would be all the difference it would make.

But as the Senator from North Carolina has desired that the regularity of his motion should be considered, I do submit as a question of order that it is not in order to move to strike out and insert the same words in the same part of the same bill, and that that defect is not cured by the failure to insert the whole of the bill after it has been stricken out and a portion inserted. If it be true that it is in order to do so, then it is certainly a new way of accomplishing a matter which is recognized every day and followed every day under the usual practice of this body. A motion to strike out certain sections is perfectly plain and is constantly voted on. A motion to strike out the whole bill and insert the same words in part back again is certainly not in order, at least to my ear and it seems to be so in the ears of those much more experienced as parliamentarians than I am. The Senator from New York, it seemed to me, demonstrated not once, but twice, three times, four times, that there was no good end, no fair and palpable end, to be reached by the motion of the Senator from North Carolina that was not much more directly, usually, completely accomplished by moving to strike out the last two sections.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senators on the other side are somewhat hard to please. In the first place they do not want anything that we want, and in the next place they insist upon prescribing the method by which we shall offer our own amendments. If they will take our amendments and put them through for us we should be very much obliged to them, but inasmuch as they will not do that I hope they will allow us the privilege, without so much complaint, of adopting the method which seems best to us in the way of proceeding. It seems to me it is perfectly legitimate for the Senator from North Carolina to offer these two sections as a substitute for the whole bill. It would appear to be a short way of getting at it. He, at least, has a right to determine that upon his own judgment. He might proceed in another way. There is no mystery about it. It does not deceive anybody; it puts nobody at disadvantage, and I know of no reason for these complaints.

So far as the amendment is concerned, the two sections contained in the substitute embrace the two propositions that have been the great theme of discussion in the Senate for months; and while other amendments might be offered to which there is little objection, yet for one I venture to express the hope that no amendment will be attached to these two main sections which embody the great subject of discussion that will at all endanger or hazard the final passage of the bill. What the country wants and what the country is looking to is not some minor amendment or some changes of details, but the two great propositions embraced in the two sections, and I hope the Senate will pass upon these propositions and not be diverted and turned aside by details or by amendments. After they have been secured, if it is the pleasure of Congress to amend or modify or change the national banking system—and there are many respects, in my judgment, in which it could be changed to advantage—I shall cheerfully co-operate with others in bringing about that measure. But after the long struggle we have had here, for one I do not propose to be diverted or turned aside from the main propositions by any attempt in the way of amendments.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am not at all familiar with parliamentary law, and I trust I never shall be; and indeed I have a great deal of confidence that that expectation of mine will be realized. [Laughter.] For myself, however, I do not share in the complaint which has been made against the proposition as submitted by the Senator from North Carolina. The Senator seems to prefer to submit at once, instead of a financial proposition, a financial plan. I do not know of anything in our rules which does or which should exclude a Senator from doing that. The only objection I have, therefore, to the proposition submitted by the Senator from North Carolina is not that he has not the right to make it, but I think it is about the worst financial plan I ever heard of.

The effect of his motion, as I understand it, is to require us to vote at once upon three propositions. One is to say that there shall be forced upon the country $44,000,000 more of irredeemable United States notes; secondly, that there shall be forced upon the country, or may be, $46,000,000 more of irredeemable bank-notes; and thirdly, that there shall be no provision in the bill which shall have any possible effect in securing a distribution of either of these sums over the country. Either of these propositions I think pretty bad; take them together, and it is an aggregation of financial ills that I have rarely seen embodied in any one motion, and I do not think it could have been invented by any one mind in any one month of the whole number of months which we have spent on this debate.

Mr. President, this debate has been inspired, and I think many of the views which have been given have been actuated and have been guided, by an impression created in September and October last that there was not currency enough in the country to do the business of the country. Over and over again Senators have been told that the trouble was not that there was not currency enough for the business of the country, but that the business of the country could not get the currency; that an illegitimate, fraudulent, gambling business, sustained and fed by the excess of your currency in one locality, absorbed that currency and so deprived the legitimate business of the country of it. Now all along it has been said that one of the great necessities of the country was to prevent the piling up of this money in that one locality, and the diversion of it from honest legitimate business to that dishonest and illegitimate business. There has been a proposition before the Senate intended to protect us against that. I am very strongly of the opinion that a very large portion of the charters held by the banks of New York ought to have been forfeited for the use they made of the money intrusted to them. That has not been done; but a great many Senators and the Committee on Finance have often called our attention to the necessity of guarding against such abuses hereafter. But now we are asked to say in one breath and by one vote, first we acknowledge that there are communities in the United States which need more banking facilities and ought to have them, but that they shall not have them except coupled by one condition, to wit, that the Treasury shall issue just as many of its notes as you provide for an increase of the bank-notes; the Treasury shall sit up and nurse every bank-note that you authorize to be put out, become responsible for its redemption; and secondly, that there shall be no precaution taken whatever to keep these bank-notes or any bank-notes in the neighborhood where they are issued whose capital provides for them, but they shall hereafter be tempted as heretofore they have been drawn into that old vortex into which you may pour bank-notes just as long as you can pour water into an abyss without filling it.

For myself, taking this view of the real significance of the proposition, the real merits of the plan that the Senator from North Carolina will have us vote upon, I never saw a proposition that I think I could vote upon with less personal embarrassment than this. I understand that I am very likely to be beaten upon it, in which case I shall have a very profound regret for my country, but for myself not an ounce.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, after what we have heard, I think it must be very manifest to the Senate that the honorable Senators who are complaining of the irregularity of my motion are simply laughing and jesting. I am very sure that they are not in earnest. I know, if I know anything about the rules at all, that the motion is perfectly regular; that there is nothing extraordinary about it, and I do not believe that there is anything of which any one can rightly complain. Now let us see how it works.

The bill, as reported from the Committee on Finance, was taken up by the Senate. It consisted of six sections. Very soon after the bill was taken up I offered this substitute for the whole bill, and the substitute has been pending from that time to this. In the course of perfecting the bill, the first section of my substitute was adopted substantially. In the further perfection of the bill the second section of it was adopted substantially. But the Senate, in perfecting the bill as it came from the Committee on Finance, did not see fit to strike out two other sections in the bill, so that the bill as it now stands before the Senate consists of the two sections embraced in the substitute and two other sections that stood in the bill as it originally came from the committee. Now, sir, in the regular order of business, I put it to the Senate to say whether or not, unless I choose to withdraw this substitute, the vote must not be taken on the substitute. I do not choose to withdraw the substitute. The substitute is a proposition entirely distinct from that which was perfected by the Senate as making up the bill. The two sections that stand in the bill, in addition to the words that make up the substitute, affect the first two sections very materially, and in a way that I do not now choose to vote for. I have the right to vote against them, and I shall claim to assert that right.

For one, I do not object to requiring the national banks to keep the whole of the gold they receive from the Government as part and parcel of their reserve. I am willing to vote for a proposition of that sort in a bill for the purpose of reforming the national-currency law. I do not know but I would agree to vote for an increase of the reserve, and for many propositions tending to strengthen the national banking system. But, sir, we have got to have the system for a considerable time to come. There is no use of talking about abolishing it now. There is no use in offering a proposition of that sort, for Congress is not in the temper to do it. By and by Congress will be, and then I shall be ready to vote for its abolition.

While I would be willing to see the proposition contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] incorporated into this bill, there are a number of Senators who are not willing to agree to it; and I repeat what I said a while ago, in order that the friends who desire an increase of the currency and an increase made under existing laws, and in a way so simple that nobody can mistake it and mistake what is meant, I do insist that the friends of increase ought to stand by this proposition and vote upon it at the earliest moment they can get to vote upon it, and be done with it, voting down every other proposition, however plausible it may be, or without regard to the source from which it comes.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to my friend that after the great questions in the first and second sections are settled, it will not be difficult to amend the national banking law in other respects in regard to which perhaps it needs amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON. It will be very easy to do it then; and I shall then be ready to join Senators on the other side in making wholesome amendments to the national banking law. I will say to the honorable Senator from Ohio what I said in the remarks which I had the honor to submit in January last, that when this proposition to increase the currency goes through Congress, I shall be ready to join him with my humble ability in devising a plan to get back to specie payments. But I am not willing to incumber this proposition with any plan of that sort.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I shall vote for the bill as it now stands in the form of the two sections moved by the Senator from North Carolina. I vote, however, with great reluctance for that portion of the bill which increases the greenbacks. In the proposition which I had the honor to submit some weeks ago in regard to the national banking system my great desire was to relieve the country from the greenbacks, as they are called, from an irredeemable currency circulated by the Government itself. I am satisfied we shall never have specie payments until the Government itself is relieved from that currency. When the Government has no more irredeemable notes payable on demand, then we shall be ready at once to get to specie payments, and I trust that time will not be long; but it never can happen until the Government is first relieved.

I shall vote for this bill because I am satisfied the country needs relief. I speak for my own State. We are a great mining and a great manufacturing country. I know that everybody engaged in each of those branches of industry is paralyzed to a great extent, almost destroyed. More than half of our iron furnaces are now entirely stopped or greatly reduced in their business. All the founderies within my knowledge are doing nothing. The car factories all over the State are nearly stopped. One at Bellefonte, close to the neighborhood of my colleague, in which a very large capital was invested, is entirely out of business; and another at Williamsport, also in his neighborhood, is doing no business. Another one at Northumberland is in the hands of the sheriff. Another one at Middletown, in my neighborhood, is in the hands of the sheriff also. So it is with our iron establishments all over the State. A large establishment at Harrisburgh, which last September employed twelve hundred workmen, now has but one hundred employed, and they are kept employed because they are old employés, who have large families and whom the proprietors think it their duty to take care of out of their own funds.

Knowing these facts I shall vote for anything that gives relief; and the issue of greenbacks, while I dislike it very much, will give immediate relief.

Mr. SCHURZ. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question? Does he think that this bill will set all those establishments going again?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes; I do. I believe that the moment you do anything here which restores confidence to the people, you will have the manufactories started again. Confidence is the one thing that they need. They want currency when they get into operation. The cry was constantly—I know it myself from my intimate acquaintance with the large manufacturers and the small manufacturers too—that every one of them needed more currency than they had. They had capital, but could not get that which enabled them to pay off their hands. It is a fact which everybody knows, that while money is plenty in the large cities there is none in the country. In the large cities we have been told very often you can borrow money at 3, 4, or 5 per cent. per annum. It is true you can, but you must have some collateral which can be turned into cash in a day as security before you can get it at any price even in times of prosperity. The manufacturers of the country need a currency which will enable them to pay their weekly and daily debts. The people in cities employ checks, and they pay millions by checks; while in the country we have no such facilities.

I shall vote for this measure, believing that before we are through we shall have to come to a general free-banking system, and then we shall make it as perfect as it can be made. I have almost a dozen amendments that I would have offered to the bill if my own proposition had been carried; but I thought the proper and most sensible way was first to get the skeleton of the measure. Let us have a vote showing that we are going to adopt a system, and then we will go to work—at least I shall with others—and endeavor to make that system perfect. But, I repeat, I shall vote for this amendment now, because it is the best we can get at present.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I understand the proposition now to be that Congress shall pass a law increasing the United States notes to $400,000,000 and the national currency to $400,000,000, and then the Senator from North Carolina will give us his valuable aid toward perfecting what he considers a proper national banking system. I have little confidence in these promises. I have here before me the first act signed by Ulysses S. Grant as President of the United States. In it the law-making power declares that the United States will at the earliest practicable period make provision to pay our United States notes in coin. And that is not all. The act further provides that no part of the national debt which bears interest shall be paid before maturity unless the United States notes are convertible into coin, and the recent Secretary of the Treasury will not dispute that millions of the unmatured interest-bearing obligations of the United States have been purchased and canceled, while the United States notes have not been made convertible into coin.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Not in violation of the law, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Why not in violation of the law?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am not in a condition to-day to argue the matter with the Senator from New Jersey. I can only say that before the purchase of bonds was undertaken, the subject was very carefully considered upon the very best information that could be obtained at the Department, and the practice of the Department was in conformity to that information, in which certainly I fully concurred; and I believe if I had time I could demonstrate its soundness.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am very sorry that our friend from Massachusetts has not occupied even the little time that he has employed in giving us an inkling or a hint of the reason why the purchase of bonds was not a violation of the law referred to. Sir, the only distinction that is attempted to be made between the law and the practice alluded to is that, as is claimed, the Government did not redeem the bonds, but purchased and canceled them—a very technical difference. Millions on millions have been purchased and canceled while the United States notes were inconvertible, and this in violation of the law; and when I introduced an amendment that we should appropriate only the surplus revenue of the United States toward the fulfillment of that solemn obligation, my friend from Massachusetts voted against it. There is, sir, an honorary obligation resting on us, growing out of this violation, if my construction of that law is true, to supply by the sale of bonds some little part of the fund by law devoted to the redemption of United States notes. We have taken unlawfully from the revenues of the country a large amount and applied it to the purchase of interest-bearing securities, and should hasten to do a little toward repairing the injury thus done to the country as the holder of the United States notes.

That is not all. Some here represent a political party to which we owe allegiance and fidelity, and one plank of the platform of that party to which attention has not here been called is this:

The annual revenues, after paying the current debt, should furnish a moderate balance for the reduction of the principal.

I introduced an amendment in accordance with the pledge of Congress and of our party to appropriate only the surplus revenues of the United States toward making the United States notes convertible into coin, and in disregard of all pledges it was voted down.

Mr. MORTON. Let us understand what that resolution was.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It reads thus:

The annual revenues, after paying the current debt, should furnish a moderate balance for the reduction of the principal.

Mr. MORTON. That has been the practice, has it not? I believe some $400,000,000 have been paid off in that way by applying it to the principal of the debt.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, Mr. President, but here is an act which goes along with the party pledge, which says that the part of the debt of the United States which bears interest shall not be paid until that which does not bear interest has been paid. Therefore the platform applies to that principal debt which does not bear interest, and that is my point. The interest-bearing debt has been unlawfully paid off, and we are bound in all fairness to make good the fund from which it has been abstracted. This Congress refuses to do.

Mr. MORTON. Does my friend arraign the Administration for having paid off the public debt?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am arraigning those who have given a solemn pledge that they would make the United States notes convertible into coin for refusing to do it, and for attempting, while they are increasing the currency $90,000,000, to amuse us with the assurance that after they have passed the bill for the increase they will render us their aid to get some law through Congress that may tend to fulfill those pledges. I will, sir, never vote for a law that increases by one dollar the currency of the country until there is with it at least some short step, some feeble measure, looking toward keeping the plighted honor both of the nation and of the republican party.

Senators say it is expensive to render the United States notes convertible into coin. Ah, yes; it generally is expensive to fulfill obligations and to pay debts. But the expense of keeping the pledge and of paying the debt is insignificant when contrasted with the expenditure not paying will entail on the country. The destruction of the credit of a nation that must for generations be in the market as a borrower can hardly be estimated. In 1881 we have $160,000,000 falling due in gold. In 1882 we have $260,000,000 falling due in gold. Of course we cannot raise the gold. All we can do is to maintain the credit of the country so that the confidence of the public in our obligations makes them the equivalent of gold, so that they will be received everywhere as gold.

Our friends here say that they are the friends of the laboring class; that they are interested in them; that they wish to start the foundries in Pennsylvania and elsewhere. Break down, sir, the credit of the nation and we must make our loans at an advanced rate of interest. Capitalists will seek the investments and will draw their capital from manufactures and the other industries of the country; and we will have two classes in the country: one the capitalists, drawing heavy interest and living on their wealth; the other a laboring class, borne down by oppressive taxation. That is the peculiar process by which you are helping the laboring men of the country.

Then, again, we are told that we cannot get the gold, and yet we have at the present time a surplus of $44,000,000 a year coming into our Treasury, and if we will take care of it we can save it. We know there is $150,000,000 of gold hoarded in the country, and we know that our mines yield $70,000,000 a year; we know, too, that our bonds are scattered over England and the Continent, and the people there are interested in maintaining the credit of our country, and we know that they will be but too happy to aid us in effecting loans or in any other measure which will secure the resumption of specie payments and make their securities good beyond all question.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, the amendment which I offered has given occasion to some language about complaints in offering amendments. I have indulged in no complaints. I recognize the right of the Senator from North Carolina to offer any amendment he sees proper, and without classing myself either with the minority or majority, with one side or the other, I claim the right as a Senator to offer any amendment which I think will improve this bill; and I have offered my amendment because I believe it will improve the bill.

What is that amendment, Mr. President? I am told it is one that ought not to be offered now. The Senator from Indiana and other Senators say to me, "Vote this increase of legal-tender notes, vote this increase of national-bank notes, and after you have done that, then we will permit you to offer such amendments as will improve the national-bank system."

Mr. MORTON. I beg my friend's pardon; I did not use any such language; I did not complain about my friend offering the amendment at all. He had a perfect right to do so. I said that, so far as I was concerned, after we had carried the main propositions—I would not endanger them by any of these details—I would then consider any question of amendment of the national banking system.

Mr. SCOTT. That is what we are informed, if I understand it, that the majority of the Senate, assuming that they have the power to adopt these two sections, say to us, "No amendment, let it be as meritorious as it may, to the national-bank system shall be considered until these two sections are adopted by and of themselves."

Mr. LOGAN. We are considering an amendment now—your own amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. We are considering an amendment, but we are informed, "You may as well not offer it." Now, Mr. President, I never legislate in that spirit. I have not been here opposing the amendments offered by those who consider themselves the majority, nor do I offer this amendment in any desire to prolong the debate or to embarrass the question. I wish to see the best measure perfected that can be obtained, and I think when we are proposing an increase of $46,000,000 of national-bank capital this amendment ought to go with that increase.

We are complaining of the monopoly of the national-bank system. Why, sir, I concur in that complaint, and I would so much prefer the loosing of all shackles upon the right of banking as to make it absolutely free if accompanied with proper provisions for the redemption of the legal-tender notes, that I would not hesitate to vote for such a bill in preference to this increase of $46,000,000; indeed I would prefer it. But when we are proposing to increase the national banking capital $46,000,000, shall we not say to those who take that national-bank capital as well as to all others, "You shall no longer keep three-fifths of your reserves in eastern cities and get interest upon them; you shall only keep one-fourth of your reserves in those cities, and upon that one-fourth you shall not get interest?" And shall we not further say to those banks, "Out of the interest which you receive from the national Government you shall first pay your national taxes, and, second, your State taxes, and that will only leave you about 2 per cent., and that 2 per cent. in gold you shall keep in your vaults?"

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me right there to make a suggestion? I do not care to enter into the debate.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not wish my time taken up.

Mr. LOGAN. I will make but one remark. The other day when the question of free banking on the basis of Pennsylvania was voted upon, with this very section in it which the Senator now proposes, I believe he was the only one of the Senators who have been opposing an increase of currency who voted for the section on the basis of Pennsylvania, and it was voted down by one vote, with this very section in it which the Senator now offers. The rest of us who were present at the time voted for it, and some were absent. Now the Senator proposes to renew it after it has been voted down.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator then exonerates me from any attempt to delay legislation, for I voted for the proposition to which he refers.

Mr. LOGAN. That is what I say; I except the Senator. He voted with us on that proposition, but his friends did not.

Mr. SCOTT. I am not responsible for the sins of others on either side, but I intend to be answerable for my own; and I now propose this amendment in entire good faith, and I wish to see how those will vote on it who are clamoring against the monopoly of the national banks, and clamoring against this system of their hoarding the greenbacks in eastern cities and getting interest upon them, depriving the people in the localities of the various banks of the benefits of circulation which the law intended to give them.

Having said this much upon the amendment, I come to notice for a moment the statement made by my colleague. He has spoken of prostrate industries in our State, and there are many of them. He and I both wish to relieve them, but we may, perhaps, although equally sincere in our endeavor to do so, differ as to the means by which that end is to be accomplished. There are rail-mills lying idle. Why? Because the railroad enterprises that were giving them their orders have been crippled by the panic. There are foundries lying idle. Why? Because that is a cognate branch of industry, and running out into every branch of the iron industry, the great railroad enterprises, which were crippled by that panic, have crippled all these. And what was that panic? Does not everybody know that it was the want of confidence in banking institutions, brought about by the leading banking-house in the country using the deposits of its customers to build a railroad instead of in legitimate banking? It destroyed that confidence. The consequence was this railroad stopped, other railroads stopped; and in consequence of that want of confidence, which has not yet been restored, our industries are languishing.

Now suppose we pass this bill, to what extent are you going to relieve those industries? How much of the circulation proposed to be given by this bill will flow into the hands of the crippled railroad enterprises or crippled manufacturing industries? Take the bill itself, and how much relief will it give to Pennsylvania? Of the $44,000,000 of legal-tender notes proposed to be legalized $26,000,000 are already out, and they went into the savings-banks of New York and did not help one industrial enterprise in the country. There are but $18,000,000 more to issue. Issue the $46,000,000 of national-bank currency under this bill, and not one dollar of it goes to Pennsylvania; it goes to the West and South; so that every dollar of relief that can come from this bill is the issuing of $18,000,000 more of legal-tender notes at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. Whether it is to be in the redemption of bonds or in the payment of the current expenses of the Government is to depend upon the form which this bill shall take; but in any form in which you can put it $18,000,000 of legal-tender notes is all that can be added to the volume of currency under this bill which will in any manner help Pennsylvania. My idea about that help is this: We cannot by legislation here put money into the pockets of those who are thus crippled; they may get the incidental advantages of a revival of trade; but the great industries, the great enterprises which were paralyzed by the panic, which caused the suspension of the mass of industries to which my colleague has referred, are enterprises which, if we wished to face the question directly, would come here at once for aid. To speak plainly, Mr. President, these languishing industries would have to be revived by Congress voting directly, granting aid to the Northern Pacific and the Southern Pacific railroads and any of the others that are languishing; and when that direct proposition comes here, we will see who of those who are now most ready to increase the currency will come up squarely to the question when it is presented.

Mr. President, my idea is that by taking care of the credit of the Government, by increasing the credit of our bonds, by increasing the honor of the American name, we shall do best to revive our prostrate industries; and when our capitalists go abroad, if our own honor be maintained, railroad bonds, municipal bonds, State bonds, and all other bonds will find a much readier market and a better price than if by our legislation we fail to meet our pledges and to keep our commercial and national honor untarnished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, my colleague and myself do not seem to agree as to the proper remedy for our present troubles. If he had voted with me some time ago to extend the national-bank system, I think he would have given that relief which the country needed; but he thought differently.

It has become very popular of late to blame all the wrongs of the country upon the poor railroads. Sir, I started out with the railroad interest at its beginning, and I remember how glad everybody was to have a railroad come into their town or through their property; and so it was until the railroads became prosperous, and then until they got into trouble. Railroads are like individuals who have been prosperous for a long while; people get envious of them. The greater the prosperity of individuals, so much the greater is the envy of those around them; and so it is with railroads.

My colleague says very truly that we cannot vote money into the pockets of our constituents. I know that; but we can so legislate as to let our constituents have incidental advantages from the expenditures of the country, and so of all other legislation. We can so shape our legislation as to increase the prosperity of the country and give confidence to the people in trade. That is what I would do by my legislation here.

As I said before, I dislike an additional issue of greenbacks; and if my colleague had gone with me to make a general system of national banks, we should have needed no more greenbacks. I support the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina because it will in some degree give relief. I think it puts off the day when gold and silver shall be seen again in circulation, and therefore I shall vote for it with reluctance. Indeed, I have a belief that before this Congress adjourns we shall have a banking system which will make the national system a free system, and then we shall get clear of the greenbacks. I desire above all things that the Government shall be released from its promises to pay which so far we have been unable to pay; and I think that will only be done after we establish some other system which will give currency enough to the country. I am sure my colleague and I have the same object in view. I regret that he has not seen the road as I have. Perhaps he is right; but I think he is wrong.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask my friend, whose opinion I always listen to with respect, would he prefer to this system a system of practical free banking with a plan of redemption; a retirement of greenbacks, say, for that is the simplest form?

Mr. CAMERON. I prefer that certainly, and I will agree with any Senator who will bring forward a proposition making a free-banking system, with such restrictions as will bring gold and silver into circulation; but I have seen no such attempt on the part of gentlemen on the other side. In truth, we have been working here upon theories, without attempting to apply any theory to the practical affairs of life. It is very easy to say that you are in favor of the resumption of specie payments; but it is not so easy to show how it can be done. The country must be prosperous before you can do it. You must revive business, you must put the laboring man to work, and you must put the enterprising man in a position to make his enterprise available to the country and useful to himself before you can have specie payments.

But, sir, I did not intend to speak so long on this subject.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, the proposition now before the Senate I understand is the third section of the bill reported by the Committee on Finance. It is a proposition that has been offered here twice by the friends of the bill as it now stands and has been voted down. I suppose that in fact, so far as the principle involved in the section is concerned, there is perhaps scarcely a member of the Senate who is opposed to it. The objection that has been made to it here this morning, and very justly, as I think, grows out of the fact that notwithstanding the substitute of the Senator from North Carolina has been pending here for days, and it had assumed, finally, by the vote of the Senate the form that it has, and this proposition had been voted down twice, those who were opposed to the pending proposition sought to put on this amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. When was this proposition voted down? I am sure I never voted against it except in connection with some other proposition.

Mr. WRIGHT. It may be very true that it was connected with something else. I do not remember whether the Senator voted for it or against it. I state the fact that it was voted down. I think it is essentially important that we get along with this business, and I therefore appeal to my friend from North Carolina to accept the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I do not know that any person would be opposed to it as an independent proposition. It came from the Committee on Finance, and the friends of the measure as it now stands before the Senate, it seems to me, can accept it. It will become a part of the substitute then, and we can have it as a whole. I appeal to my friend to accept the amendment, and thus get the question out of the way.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, let us see what this third section is. It provides—

> That each national banking association, now organized or hereafter to be organized, shall keep and maintain, as a part of its reserve required by law, one-fourth part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits.

Now, mark it; it does not require that the percentage of reserve shall be increased at all; it only requires that one-fourth of the gold received by those banks on their bonds which are deposited as security for their circulation shall be retained by the banks; and if this process goes on it can only result in accumulating in gold in the end an amount equal to the reserve, which is in most of the banks a reserve of 15 per cent. How much would it require a bank with a capital of $100,000 to lay up and accumulate year by year? Simply the sum of $1,500 in gold each year. If you make the calculation you will find that $1,500 is the one-sixtieth part of the circulation to which a bank with a capital of $100,000 is entitled; and so it would take sixty years, if this accumulation were to go on, before you would have as much gold as you had bank-notes out. But of course nobody would require that much in order to resume specie payments; and yet this measure, which only requires an accumulation annually of one-sixtieth part of the circulation, is resisted by some gentlemen who are in favor of inflation.

Mr. LOGAN. Did you not vote against the amendment making Pennsylvania the basis?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not care if I did. I voted against making Pennsylvania the basis, which was a wholly different proposition from this. Because I voted against what was then supposed by every Senator to be a greater inflation than that proposed by the bill, am I therefore to be told that I voted against this proposition? No, sir. But let no man say who opposes this section now that he is in favor of a resumption of specie payments any time this side of eternity. A man who will not vote to accumulate in a single year one-sixtieth part of the circulation of a bank need not talk to this people about being in favor of resumption either now or hereafter.

So much for that part. Now let us see what the rest of this section is:

> And that hereafter only one-fourth of the reserve now prescribed by law for national banking associations shall consist of balances due to an association available for the redemption of its circulating notes from associations in cities of redemption, and upon which balances no interest shall be paid.

I do not presume to speak for other States, but I can speak for Ohio, and I say that if the Ohio banks last September and October had been able to get their reserves that were in the city of New York, not one single one of them would have been cramped at all, not one single one of them would ever have issued a certified check; but simply because they could not get those balances, for a time they were in a state of quasi suspension and some of them were compelled to issue their certified checks. And now when it is proposed to put an end to that provision of the present law, which was the very cause why the western and southern banks were thus cramped, it is opposed by those gentlemen who represent everybody here who will not go for inflation as friends and advocates of the national banks. I hope after this exposition of their sentiments there will be nothing more of that kind said on this floor or elsewhere.

Talk about friends of a national-bank monopoly, forsooth! Who are the friends of a national-bank monopoly but those who are making it so utterly odious in this country by their ill-timed advocacy that in the end it will go to the wall because no people will sustain it? Why, how is it? Nine out of ten of all the national banks in this country are opposed to measures for the resumption of specie payments, and every Senator on this floor knows it, because it is much easier for them to pay when called upon, though they are never called upon, in the legal-tender notes of the United States, than to pay in good hard money.

But, sir, I do not see fit to repeat what I have said on this subject before. I wish to call attention to the fact that when it is proposed that these banks shall be required to lay up annually in coin only one-sixtieth part of their circulation, that proposition is opposed on this floor by those who claim to be the particular friends of the people; and not only that, when it is proposed that the interior banks shall keep their reserves at home to lend to their own people, that proposition is opposed by those who profess to be the friends of the South and West!

Mr. LOGAN. Inasmuch as this proposition was reported by the Finance Committee, then offered by me, and as it has been before the Senate two or three times, I think it is a proper amendment to the bill, and I am very glad to see it come now from the other side, if I may use the expression. I hope that now our friends will accept it, and then I hope that the Senators who have advocated it this morning will vote for the bill when it is a part of it. I hope the Senator from North Carolina will accept the proposition, and then we shall see who will go on the record in favor of it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have already said that I was not opposed to this measure per se. I only opposed it in the outset because I thought it might in some measure affect adversely the substitute that I offered. I am content not only to vote that the national banks shall be required to keep a third, but that they shall be required to keep all the gold they receive from the Treasury as part and parcel of their reserve. I think, however, this is a very poor measure with which to return to specie payments; I am not satisfied with it in that regard; but I did not want to incumber this substitute with any movement of that sort that would jeopardize it. I am content, at the request of the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Iowa, to accept the proposition; and I trust that now my friend from Pennsylvania will support——

Mr. LOGAN. And my friend from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

Mr. MERRIMON. And my friend from Ohio, too, will support the substitute as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina accepts the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania as a part of his substitute.

Mr. CONKLING. I suppose there is no objection to the remaining section, section 6, providing that the principal of the debt shall not be increased. Has the Senator from North Carolina any objection to that?

Mr. MERRIMON. There are very serious objections to that.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I move to amend the substitute by adding the last section of the bill of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves to amend the substitute by adding the last section of the bill, as follows:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any increase of the principal of the public debt of the United States.

Mr. MERRIMON. That would make the substitute and the bill itself absurd.

Mr. CONKLING. Why?

Mr. MERRIMON. Because we propose to increase the national debt to the extent at least of $18,000,000 of greenbacks not now in circulation.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it is understood that this is a bill to increase the public debt $18,000,000, that presents a still graver question. Within the last five years—yes, within the last nine years—nobody has ever proposed a bill to increase the public debt. The idea of increasing the public debt of this country since the close of the war has ever been resisted, and every financial bill that we have passed, so far as I can recollect, even the bill of 1869 to strengthen the public credit, has always contained this provision, that it shall not provide an increase of the public debt; and the committee reported this section to guard against the conclusion and the possibility of it.

Now, sir, is it understood that this $18,000,000 is to be issued to increase the public debt? I supposed that one of the claims was that this $18,000,000 was to be used to buy up some portion of the public debt; but if it is understood by the people of the United States that their debt is now to be increased to the extent of $18,000,000 by the issue of an inconvertible depreciated paper money, that presents a different aspect to this bill.

It seems to me, therefore, that this amendment ought not to be resisted by any one. How is this $18,000,000 to be used? How is it to be got out? I supposed that as a matter of course it would be in the payment of bonds or the ordinary current expenses of the Government. In this way there would be no increase in the public debt. But if it is understood that the $18,000,000 is to be paid out in the increase of the public debt, divided up so that each inhabitant of the United States shall get forty-six cents of this money, (because that is about the ratio,) or in some other way other than the payment of the public debt for the current expenses, that presents a very different question.

Sir, a provision similar to this has been in every financial measure that has passed since the close of the war that I can now recall. If there is any financial law in our statute-books that does not contain it, I should like to know it. If it is the purpose of this bill to increase the public debt by this most objectionable form of debt, inconvertible paper money, then we shall understand it more clearly and definitely.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, this part of the debate is really charming. The Senator from Ohio has just made a discovery that possibly the public debt might be increased by a new issue of greenbacks. After having advocated for days here a proposition to fund existing greenbacks into a 5 per cent. bond, to convert a non-interest-bearing debt into an interest-bearing debt, and then pay out those greenbacks for the current expenses of the Government, a direct increase of the public debt advocated by the hour here, the Senator now is inexpressibly shocked by a proposition to increase the public debt. Really the simplicity of this is charming.

Mr. BAYARD. Let me say to the Senator from Indiana that he certainly forgets that the proposition of this section preventing anything in the bill from authorizing an increase of the public debt was in it when it came from the committee and has been in it ever since, and was put on the very bill to which the Senator now refers.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir; and was exceedingly absurd on that account, because everybody knew that if the greenbacks were funded into a 5 per cent. bond, and the same greenbacks were then paid out for current expenses, the public debt would be increased to that amount, because then the greenbacks and the bonds would both be out. The proposition was simply absurd.

Now, Mr. President, if these greenbacks are issued, as I presume they will be, in the purchase of 6 per cent. bonds, there is no increase of the public debt; but there might be an interregnum between the two, there might be for a period some increase of the public debt, or possibly they might be paid out for current expenses as the $26,000,000 were, at a time when your revenues ran short, and you had no money to keep this Government going. So the $26,000,000 were paid out and the public debt was increased, when the Government must increase it in that way or go to protest. And yet the idea has suddenly burst on the Senator as something he had never heard of before! No, Mr. President, this proposition can only be added for embarrassment. I know of no way that the Secretary of the Treasury can get these greenbacks into circulation unless it be by purchasing up the old debt, which I hope he will do promptly, or if the revenues should run short then he might use them to carry on the Government as he did the $26,000,000.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. May I remind the Senator from Indiana that under this proposition now suggested by the Senator from North Carolina the $18,000,000 will reach the channels of business by the same process that the $26,000,000 have reached the public pockets, and I never before have heard the Senator from Ohio cry out against the increase of the public debt because the $26,000,000 have reached the channels of trade, running the issue of greenbacks from $356,000,000 up to $382,000,000. If I am not mistaken that Senator himself reported a bill by which it was proposed to declare that the maximum of greenbacks should be $382,000,000 instead of $356,000,000, thus recognizing through this very process the issue of the $26,000,000.

I did not mean to say one word to-day; I feel that we should come to a vote; but when the chairman of the Committee on Finance springs at an opportunity to frighten the Senate upon an amendment which says that the public debt shall not be increased, as though we advocated a measure here by which the public debt was largely to be increased, and this system of attaching amendment to amendment is resorted to and supplemented by threat and menace, I hope the majority of this Senate, who are looking to a measure which they are now perfecting through their substitute, will stand by and hear the threats and vote in silence.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend from Michigan calls me to account because I did not denounce the Secretary of the Treasury as a criminal for issuing the $26,000,000. Mr. President, I have denounced the Secretary of the Treasury as performing an unlawful act over and over and over again in this Senate. I submitted to the Senate a formal report which denied his power to issue the $26,000,000, and from the beginning to the end of this controversy I have held that that $26,000,000 was unlawfully issued, and I now assert it again; but still it was out and we had to pay it, and as a matter of course, as one of the Senators from Ohio, I felt it our duty to make provision for its payment and recognize its validity, because we could not avoid it. But now, that being out, when the Secretary of the Treasury tells you that he has no occasion to issue any more of it; that the $18,000,000 is not necessary to meet the current expenses, why require him to do it? There is one way of putting out the $18,000,000 in the purchase of an interest-paying debt, but now it is proposed to issue that $18,000,000. How? By an actual increase of the public debt. When we proposed $382,000,000 as the maximum, and had the second section in the bill which provided for advancing the greenbacks up to the par of bonds, even with that section which, as I explained to the Senate, might, unrestrained by the sixth section, possibly in a given case lead to an increase of the public debt, we reported from the committee by a unanimous vote this section—perhaps not, I see my friend from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] shakes his head about it—but at any rate we reported from the Committee on Finance this section which declared that under the operations of this bill there could be no increase of the public debt. As a matter of course, if we authorize $18,000,000 to buy interest-bearing bonds, that is no increase of the principal of the debt; but if it is to be divided out, parceled out, issued for current expenses, and thus give to the House of Representatives and to the Senate and to Congress an excuse for not levying enough taxes to carry on the expenses of the Government and to provide for meeting deficiencies and carrying on the expenses of the Government by this $18,000,000 of paper money, it does present a question that has not been presented to us since the close of the war.

Sir, I do not threaten; I simply state a fact. I do not suppose with the temper of the Senate this bill will be put in such a position that I can vote for it; but that ought not to prevent me from doing all I can, and I certainly will do all I can whoever goes to the contrary, to perfect this bill; and I shall place my own opinion in writing by offering amendments and asking the vote of the Senate; having the same right to do it as any other Senator, no more and no less, I shall not be deterred from doing this by any observations that are made. I say here this proposition to increase the public debt by the issue of $18,000,000 of irredeemable paper money is a worse proposition than has been made in connection with our finances since the close of the war.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I will say one word more. I desire to call the attention of the honorable chairman to the fact $26,000,000 of this same amount of $400,000,000 greenbacks have reached the public, and this proposition is simply to have $18,000,000, if necessary, reach the public through similar channels or through the purchase of the bonds of the Government. Now I say that where there was a doubt upon the maximum of the greenbacks the Senate proceeded to declare and the House have declared that $400,000,000 instead of $356,000,000 shall be the maximum of the greenbacks. Now this is not $18,000,000 in excess of that, but $18,000,000 within the $400,000,000; and I say to the Senator that so long as he maintained silence and never criticised the issue of $26,000,000 so far as it was an increase of the public debt, he cannot logically criticise the issue of $18,000,000 further to make up the maximum of $400,000,000. It is a part and parcel of the $400,000,000; and therefore this issue is not an increase of the public debt, but merely a putting into the hands of the public of the very maximum which you have declared by vote here is the sum which the greenbacks shall reach.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether it is a fact that the $26,000,000 did increase the principal of the public debt? I do not understand so. I understand that that amount of bonds was retired.

Mr. MORTON. No; the Senator is mistaken. It was paid out for current expenses. The $15,000,000 in the Treasury before were paid out for bonds, but not the $26,000,000.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I understand that the $26,000,000 was paid out in the expenses of the Government, not in the purchase of the public debt; there was no retiring of the bonded debt of the Government; but that was an issue to meet the exigency of the panic and its results. We are seeking to continue up to the maximum which you and the House have declared shall be allowed, and to issue the $18,000,000 to meet this same exigency and results; and now it is charged upon us that in pursuing this example set by the report of the Committee on Finance we are seeking to increase the public debt! I say if it is good in one case, it is good in the other.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a statement of the month of February, 1874. That statement shows that the increase of the public debt since June 30, 1873, was $7,061,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. And that has been reduced to about four and a half millions.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That temporarily may have been an increase of the public debt, not $26,000,000, but $7,000,000, and that only temporarily; but I understand that has been reduced to $4,000,000.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator from New Jersey is too cautious a man to declare, but he says he thinks, that this may be the case. The Secretary of the Treasury is selling the coin, and may be, for that purpose, purchasing the public debt. He may be reducing the public debt or he may not. I declare here that the method in which the $26,000,000 has reached the public has been through the expenditures, the necessary expenditures of the Government, the same way by which this $18,000,000 will reach the public; and I say that if it was authorized in the case of the $26,000,000 it is authorized in the case of the $18,000,000 more, and I fall back upon the position taken by the Senator when, very earnestly, he attempts now to further trammel the proposition by a suggestion that we are here to increase the public debt. I, for one, am not to be frightened by that, and I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, if this $18,000,000 is paid out in the purchase of the public debt, there is no increase of it; if it should be paid out for current expenses, there would be an increase. The Secretary of the Treasury has but the two ways to pay it out: in the purchase of the public debt, or for current expenses when the revenues of the Government run short. The adoption of the amendment therefore could have but one effect, to embarrass the Treasury when the revenues ran short and the money was required to carry on the Government. That is the only effect it would have.

Now, Mr. President, we understand, of course, the policy of all these amendments. I hope the friends of the two propositions embraced in these two sections will stand by them. There is no good to be attained, I am satisfied, by the adoption of amendments, and those who offer these amendments are not the friends of the bill, but seek to embarrass the bill by putting these amendments on it. I hope these two propositions will be carried, and if further legislation is required to amend the national banking system, or for any other purpose, there will be ample opportunity to do that. But I hope these two great propositions to which the country is now looking with most intense interest everywhere will not be hazarded by amendments offered by their enemies.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It becomes a little interesting to know exactly what the effect of this bill in its present condition would be; and from the admission of my friend from Indiana it cannot longer be doubted what it would be as to the $44,000,000 of greenbacks issued and to be issued, and that is, that it adds $44,000,000 to the public debt. The Senator says that it is undoubtedly true that if the $18,000,000 not now issued is actually paid out for ordinary expenses of the Government, it adds so much to the public debt. Let us assume now that the $26,000,000, which it is said by the Senator from Michigan is paid out, is so much added to the debt——

Mr. THURMAN. Being, like Michael Cassio, something of an arithmetician, I should like to know how it would add to the public debt, if the Government owes a man money on an open account, to give him its promissory note for it. There is no addition to the public debt in such a case.

Mr. MORTON. That is an argument on our side; and if the Senator from Ohio thinks it good, all right.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to know whether the Senator from Ohio was interrogating me or the Senator from Indiana. I was arguing on the assumption of the Senator from Indiana. If his premises are false, the Senator can correct them.

Mr. THURMAN. If I am not disturbing the Senator, I will say this: The Secretary of the Treasury cannot pay money out except in discharge of some debt, whether it is a salary, whether it is wages, or what not. He cannot pay money out without paying a debt, unless he is to go around and make purchases of things that he may want.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I can conceive, notwithstanding the interruption of my honorable friend from Ohio, that it is possible for a great Government like ours to pay its ordinary expenses out of its accruing receipts, and not be put to the necessity of issuing greenbacks for such a purpose.

But the object of my honorable friend from Indiana is that this money shall be paid out, shall go into circulation. That is the purpose; and no matter what are the receipts of the Government over its demands, this paper is to go into circulation; and my honorable friend will allow no amendment to be put on this bill which prevents that result; and the position he takes is evidence of that. Now if you put on this sixth section, it cannot go into circulation and you cannot by so much increase the national debt. There is the point; and no Senator here who thinks that the volume of currency by way of greenbacks ought to be increased to that extent can vote for it, I admit.

The obnoxious thing about this to me has been from the beginning that it does increase the national debt; and gentlemen who are proposing this measure will not be able to shirk the responsibility of it in any way. By adding $44,000,000 to the volume of currency in the shape of greenbacks, you add so much to the national debt of the country in any way you can fix it. My honorable friend admits that, and it is unquestionably true.

Mr. MORTON. No; if you pay off that amount of bonds, you do not add to the debt.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; but that is precisely what is not intended. The resistance to this sixth section shows clearly that gentlemen who vote for this bill intend that this $18,000,000 shall go into circulation, and there is no way of getting it into circulation except by paying it out for the ordinary expenses. How is that to be done? It is as easy to be done as possible, and in this way: Every man who votes against this sixth section will be bound to vote against taxes, no matter what the embarrassments of the Government are. There is no way you can force it into circulation except by making the burdens of the Government larger than its receipts, and then it will go out. And, sir, in my judgment, if this distempered notion about paper currency being a relief had not seized upon the public mind, and so upon its representatives when this Congress met, and we had had a salutary policy of taxing to meet the demands of the Government, this condition of things would have been rendered impossible and unnecessary. But as it is, with no provision for the current expenses of the Government and for the extraordinary liabilities of the Government for the payment of the interest on the public debt, and to prepare for the sinking fund, which will require $30,000,000 at the close of this fiscal year, how are you to prevent the issuing of the balance of these legal-tenders for the current expenses of the Government? The time is not far ahead on this legislation when it will become the necessity of the Government to do that very thing as matters are.

Mr. President, I voted against authorizing or establishing the volume of legal-tender currency at $382,000,000 on the ground that I maintain, that the $44,000,000 held as a reserve was actually redeemed, redeemed under the policy declared by Congress and under the policy practiced by the Treasury Department. I attach no importance to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury called it and held it as a reserve. The reserve which was authorized by the act of 1865 had passed out of existence entirely anterior to the act of 1869. This $44,000,000 was redeemed in the sense of payment, and being paid could not be reissued, and on my theory, of course, it cannot be legalized; and therefore under no circumstances would I vote for the issue of the $44,000,000 for the ordinary expenses of the Government, because I do not believe that one single dollar of the legal-tender notes which had been under the policy of Congress absolutely redeemed and paid, and thus become extinguished, can by any power we can exercise, short of the exigency of a great public war or some other equivalent exigency, be reissued under the authority of Congress. I shall vote for this sixth section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.]

Mr. BAYARD. I merely rise to call the attention of the Senate to the absurd position in which this body is placed. With the law of 1862, establishing a sinking fund for the diminution of the debt, a law that has been recognized in 1870, which has been carried, and more than carried, into effect by the Secretary of the Treasury who is now Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL]—with that law still remaining on our statute-books, requiring a sinking fund to diminish the debt, here is another bill proposed to become a law so much lauded, which proposes to increase it in a single year $44,000,000! The sinking fund by law is 1 per cent. upon the entire indebtedness, including also 1 per cent. upon the interest of the bonds which have been already retired under the process of the law creating the sinking fund, so that in round numbers by law the Secretary is bound to diminish the debt from the income of the country about $30,000,000 in 1874; and in the same year the Congress of the United States declare that it shall be increased $44,000,000! This is getting up two stairs and falling back three, according to the old negro song; and this is the legislation which is presented for the purpose of establishing the credit of the Government of the United States! Because it is plain that the legal debt in Treasury notes of the United States to-day as authorized by law is $356,000,000, the present bill increases it at one step to $400,000,000, an increase of $44,000,000, with a statute staring full in the face of every member of the body and of the whole world that we had promised to retire our debt under the policy of a sinking fund. It seems to me that the two acts are such commentaries upon each other and the latter so full of bad faith and absurdity that it ought to cause any man to pause before his assent can be given to such a measure as increasing the public debt, and that in the worst form, a form worse than doubtful under the limitations of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. President, the section which the Senator from New York desires to see retained, and I think with great propriety, has been, as the Senator from Ohio who sits in front of me [Mr. SHERMAN] has said, in every law we have passed on the subject of funding or dealing with the national debt since the close of the war, that nothing therein should be authorized to increase the public debt. It was to prevent any possible construction by reaching or overreaching by this new-fangled word "reserve" which would allow the debt of the people of the United States to be increased, which means denying the right of their representatives to add heavier burdens upon them than existed.

But I have drawn the attention of the Senate to the fact that we are turning our sinking fund law into an absurdity by this proposition not to diminish the debt but to increase it and increase it in the most dangerous form known to our system.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] to the substitute.

Mr. CONKLING and Mr. SCHURZ called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment by inserting at the end thereof:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any increase of the principal of the public debt of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That is the same section as was reported by the Committee on Finance, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the last section of the original bill reported by the committee.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the yeas and nays.

Mr. FLANAGAN, (when his name was called.) I am still laboring under the understanding of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNLOW] that I would pair with him. I should vote most anxiously "yea," and he, I suppose, would vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE.]

Mr. MITCHELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who, if present, would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. SPENCER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. STOCKTON, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] who is unable to be here. If present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. WRIGHT, (when his name was called.) My pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] still continues. I understand his colleague voted "yea." I should vote "nay" if at liberty to do so.

The roll-call being concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Kelly, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Thurman, and Wadleigh—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Tipton, West, and Windom—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Conover, Cooper, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Jones, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Ransom, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, and Wright—20.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, encouraged by a hint that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] gave just now, I offer an amendment which I think will meet his view, and I have reason to know it will meet the views of several other Senators. I move to amend the second section of the substitute by adding thereto the following:

That within thirty days after circulating notes to the amount of $1,000,000 shall be issued to national banking associations under the preceding section, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to 70 per cent. of the circulating notes so issued, which shall be in further reduction of the volume of $400,000,000 fixed by the preceding section; and such reduction shall continue until the whole $46,000,000 of circulating notes shall be issued. And for that purpose he is authorized to issue and sell at public sale, after ten days' notice of the time and place of sale, a sufficient amount of the bonds of the United States of the character and description prescribed in the second section of this act for United States notes to be then retired and canceled.

Mr. CAMERON. I am very sorry to say that I cannot adopt the advice of the Senator from Wisconsin; but if he will make the banking system free I will agree to retire a certain amount of Government notes to meet a certain amount of national-bank notes that may be issued.

Mr. ANTHONY. What proportion?

Mr. CAMERON. It would take some time to think about that.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator from Pennsylvania says that if we will make banking entirely free, he is willing to vote for a bill containing such a proposition. I think there would be many here willing to do the same thing, if a provision were added which would plainly and distinctly put us on the way to specie payments. But how does the case stand now? The majority, who were first advocating free banking, have reconsidered their original intentions. To-day we were informed by the Senator from Indiana that the people wanted this bill and nothing else. A few months ago we were informed that "the people" wanted an addition to the greenback currency of about $100,000,000. Then we were very emphatically told that "the people" wanted free banking, the total abolition of the banking monopoly. Then the scene shifted again, and "the people" wanted banking on the basis of Maine. "The people" changed their minds once more, and then wanted banking on the basis of Pennsylvania; and now, finally, "the people" have come down to the exact bill which is before us, and will not admit any amendment at all. "The people" on this floor seem to be somewhat fluctuating as the currency will be fluctuating if we pass a bill like this.

Now, if the majority had shown a willingness to retire greenbacks in the same measure as national-bank notes are issued, thus opening an approach to specie payments, I think many of us would have been willing to entertain such a proposition. But, sir, the majority do not intend to admit any such thing. The majority want an inflation of the currency as such, under all circumstances, in any shape, and by every means they can obtain it, whatever may become of the finances of the country afterward; and I prophesy if the increase at present demanded of the currency is not sufficient for those purposes, then the majority will insist upon more and more; and there I see the principal danger of the policy here pursued. They would have insisted upon much more now had they thought it safe.

Mr. President, we have heard to-day assurances if we only pass this bill how good the majority would be then; how willing to reform the national banking law so as to meet our views. The Senator from North Carolina went even so far as to tell us if we only gave him $90,000,000 more currency now he would soon be the most enthusiastic advocate of specie payments among us. Inflation first and specie payments afterward! Why, gentlemen, do we not see how ridiculous all this is? We have sat here for three or four months listening to a debate upon the financial question. Have we learned nothing from it? Did not the inflationists advocate an inflation of the currency pure and simple, inflation for its own sake? What, then, can their contingent promises mean now?

Sir, after what we have heard, it is too late for gentlemen to tell us that they would do this and that and the other thing to give the country a sound financial system, if we only now let them have their own way. Let it be known to the country that the majority of the Senate is determined to reject everything that has the least tendency to bring us back to a sound basis; that the majority of the Senate is bent upon cutting loose for an indefinite time from every safe anchorage; and—mark what I say— that the majority of the Senate, with stubborn determination, is launching out upon a road that will lead to repudiation, unless the reckless movement be soon arrested.

Sir, that is the direction in which the legislation here proposed is tending, and the sooner the people open their eyes the better. Have we not heard here the doctrine preached even by those who want us to believe that they desire only a moderate expansion of the currency—the doctrine that an irredeemable paper money is after all the best thing the country can have? What does all this mean? It means that we are to be launched upon that sea which has no shores, in a ship which has no rudder. Whatever circumlocution may be used to disguise it, this is what the majority here wants and it is best for us and for the country to understand it.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am sadly disappointed at the result of my effort to meet the wishes of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] I heard him lament on the floor this morning the necessity which seemed to compel him to vote for a bill which provided for an increase of irredeemable United States notes. I knew that that lamentation was sincere; I knew it had been the usage of his life not to issue a note of his own that he did not take up; and I knew that he thought as much of the honor of his country as he did of his own honor; and I knew, therefore, that he must feel that distress, that mortification which I think is felt by every other patriot in view of the fact that there still circulates over the country a large volume of national promises due, overdue, unpaid, and without an effort made to pay them. I therefore sympathized both with him and myself in a feeling of mortification at seeing a proposition here to add to that volume. I knew it was too late to hope to do much in the way of avoiding or correcting that evil. The necessity is upon us; we have got to swallow the dose, bitter as it is to my friend, bitter as it is to myself. We must swallow, I think, $44,000,000 more of this irredeemable paper. This expedient occurred to me: That we might provide in this simple way to throw up the dose gradually. I know, sickening as it is to my friend and to myself, it will be painful to carry it so long as we shall be compelled to carry it, even under the operation of my amendment; but I appeal to my friend if it is not better to provide for some way of getting rid of it. I agree with him that it would be a great deal better to incorporate in your bill a provision which should make these banking franchises free and unrestricted, and accompany that with some such provision as this, under the operation of which we should see the last greenback go out of sight. But then the friends who are acting with my friend from Pennsylvania will not consent to that. I hoped we could do so much as this: provide for getting rid of this additional quantity. I am almost induced to withdraw my amendment, seeing that my friend will not give it the support of his vote.

Mr. SCHURZ. I was about——

Mr. HOWE. No; I will not withdraw it. To accommodate my friend from Missouri I think I will let it remain and take the vote of the Senate upon it.

Mr. SCHURZ. I was merely going to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin this: if the Senator from Pennsylvania was willing to vote for it in connection with free banking, is there any reason in the world why he should not vote for it in connection with that measure of free banking which is given here?

Mr. CAMERON. I am no prophet, as the Senator from Missouri a little while ago said he was, and therefore I cannot tell what will happen in the future. I believe now we want some more circulation, some more currency to enable our people to transact their business comfortably and prosperously, and therefore I take this bill as the best I can get. I have great faith in my friend from Wisconsin. I know he is a serious man. He hardly ever jests; he hardly ever smiles; and yet he is the cause of other men jesting and smiling. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE. It is so long since I have seen any occasion to smile that I hope my friend will pardon me. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMERON. Now he gets on the other extreme; but he is not a despondent man I am sure. He does not believe the country is going to ruin headlong. I think he believes, as I do, that there is a great deal of good left in the country and a great deal of good left in mankind. Indeed, I believe, taking them generally, men are good. The exception is a bad man in a crowd. And, therefore, I am always hopeful. I do not believe this country is going to be destroyed by any legislation we shall enact here. There is too much good sense in this body to vote for anything that would at all tend to the destruction of the country. Every man here wants to do right. Some of us do not know as much as others, and, of course, may err. My friend—and I am glad to call him my friend—the Senator from Missouri frequently lectures me, and I listen with great attention because I have faith in his great ability; I admire his genius, and I honor his patriotism; but sometimes I think that even he is wrong—not often, I am sure, but sometimes. All this winter he has been arguing on abstract principles; he has not proposed a single practical thing that I have heard. Not anything at all has he done but talk about the dangers of inflation; I believe it was he who invented the word "inflation." What does it mean? There has been no inflation that I have seen; there can be none now. My friend from Wisconsin talks about our swallowing $44,000,000 and thinks we should have some antidote to relieve the stomach from it. Why, sir, there are only $18,000,000 that have not been gobbled up, to use a phrase that is employed here; all the rest has been used for the benefit of the country and to meet the needs of the country.

Now, I repeat, after we shall have passed this bill, when probably the gentlemen who have been urging so much on the other side will begin to reflect more seriously on the interests of the country, they will agree to unbend themselves a little and do something toward getting such a compromise as will be of service all around. For the present I vote for this bill, because I have started out with gentlemen who held in the main the same notions I have on this subject, and I never leave my friends when they need my services.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I thought I should not have made another observation, but I feel inclined to do so at this moment. The measure before us is apparently Senate bill No. 617, "to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes and free banking." I had understood it for months to be something of that order. To-day, however, the scales have fallen from my eyes. My distinguished friend, the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] whom I love for his good sense, his kind heart, and his much knowledge, has candidly to-day made known to the Senate the true object of this bill; it is stripped of its entire garb that it has been claiming to sail under from the introduction of it until this day. He says that he dislikes several of its features; so do I; but he will take them in the spirit of compromise, because it is the most substantial relief that the country can get. Therefore, simplified, it is nothing more nor less than a relief measure.

But to whom does the relief flow out as proposed in the bill, according to the arguments of different Senators here on this occasion, to-day more particularly than heretofore? It is for the debtor class; but there is no notice or observation, even remotely, of the other party who has an equal interest. The debtor is to be protected. Now I would rather meet my friend in a spirit of compromise and let him suggest A, B, or C, the corporations of the country if you please, that need relief, (for railroads have been lugged into the argument,) and "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." Let them come and ask relief. Let us understand what we are doing. I am on their side. I am for speculation where it is legitimate, for it is that which develops this proud nation. I am no opponent to speculation on proper principles. Let us know, however, who it is that we are proposing this relief for. Let them tender their bonds if you will at one, two, three, five, or ten years; let the United States come forward and indorse them, yea, finally pay them if it should be necessary, rather than to compromise the faith, the honesty that is solemnly pledged by your laws that you will redeem the currency of the United States at the earliest practicable period. There is nothing here that tends to the point that you intend to do that, even at a remote period. You do not say that even at a future season you will do so; not a word of it.

True, it is said here pro and con that gentlemen are ready to do thus and so after the opponents of redemption perfect this bill to suit themselves. Then they may give the minority terms. They have the majority now; let the responsibility be upon them, and when we go to sea with an additional debt on the United States, where will they land us? My distinguished friend from Michigan says that he fears not the consequences of an increased debt of the nation. He does not deny it. It is understood that the debt is to be increased, and no provision directly or remotely referred to when we shall swing back to the solemn pledge that is found on our statute-books.

It has been said that it was a war measure that caused the greenbacks to come into existence. There is no war now, and now is the time in good faith to prepare for their redemption; and there is no way of redeeming them except you recognize coin in the transaction. I see no such idea here; it is entirely ignored, and it may go hence to every portion of this broad nation and to the civilized world that the day for redemption and for a coin currency is ignored. The examples of other nations of the earth are invoked from time to time, and it is said by Senators that they are using a paper currency, ignoring gold in every sense of the word. That will not do. The people will not be satisfied with that. The workingmen in their machine-shops, in your navy-yards, in the shoe-shops, and elsewhere, the plowman in his corn-field, in his potato-patch, in his tobacco-field, in his cotton-field, the bone and sinew of this mighty nation, will hold the Senate to a strict accountability at an early day; and they will not be satisfied with my distinguished friends who say they care not for assuming the responsibility of increasing this debt and making no preparation, either directly or remotely, to redeem the solemn pledge found on your statute-book.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOREMAN in the chair.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] to the substitute of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.]

Mr. HOWE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE.] If he were present I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. STOCKTON, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.] If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 25, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Kelly, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Thurman, and Wadleigh—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Tipton, West, and Windom—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Conover, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Ransom, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, and Wright—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the first section of the substitute:

Provided, That no part of the increase of United States notes hereby authorized shall be held directly or indirectly to place any money in the Treasury of the United States which may or can be used for any future appropriation.

The Senate have already voted down the proposition that this bill shall not be so construed as to increase the public debt. I desire now a distinct vote upon the proposition whether this increase is to be used for any future ordinary appropriations that we may make. I do not propose to argue the question, but merely submit it so that we may know precisely what is intended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL;] otherwise I should vote "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Fenton, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Jones, Kelly, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Stewart, Thurman, and Wadleigh—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Tipton, West, and Windom—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Conover, Davis, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Howe, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Ransom, Scott, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, and Wright—20.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I offer the following amendment to be added to the substitute:

That the tax of 10 per cent. now imposed by law on the notes of State banks or State banking associations be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am paired generally with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] I can hardly say, however, that if he were here he would vote for this proposition. I would vote against it; but for fear he might vote for it I shall not vote.

Mr. DAVIS. I am requested to announce the pair of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CONOVER.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 12, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Davis, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Patterson, Sargent, Saulsbury, and Thurman—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Tipton, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—38.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hager, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Ransom, Schurz, Sprague, Stevenson, and Stockton—22.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply want to call attention to the fact that the only difference between the substitute and the bill as pending is in one section with regard to the increase of the public debt. That is the only difference between the two. They are in hæc verba the same except as to that one section. The substitute now pending offered by the Senator from North Carolina differs only from the text of the bill now before the Senate in omitting that one section.

Mr. CONKLING. So that those who vote for the amendment vote that there may be an increase of the public debt, and those who vote against it that there shall not.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. In order to make that distinct, I ask the Secretary to read the only difference.

The CHIEF CLERK. The only difference is the insertion of section 4 in the bill, which is in the following words:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any increase of the principal of the public debt of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. We all understand it. We are not to be frightened.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAVIS, (when his name was called.) I desire to say that I cannot vote to increase the public debt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order during the calling of the roll.

Mr. DAVIS. I only desire to say a word in explanation of my vote. The sixth section of the bill as reported by the Committee on Finance, declaring that the national debt shall not be increased, having been omitted in this substitute, I cannot vote for it. The friends of the substitute have voted down a proposition to insert that section. I cannot vote for any measure that will increase the debt of the United States. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] If he were here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 29, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Tipton, West, and Windom—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Kelly, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Thurman, and Wadleigh—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Conover, Cooper, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Ransom, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, and Wright—19.

So the substitute of Mr. MERRIMON, as modified, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, having made one amendment to the bill, the question now is on concurring in that amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend by substituting for the amendment what I send to the Chair.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is moved to strike out all after the word "that" in the first line of the amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, and to insert:

The maximum amount of United States notes is hereby fixed at $400,000,000, at which amount it shall remain until reduced as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That on the 1st day of January, 1877, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to pay on demand, at the office of the Treasurer of the United States, and at the office of the assistant treasurer in the city of New York, to any holder of United States notes to the amount of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, in exchange for such notes, an equal amount of the gold coin of the United States; or, in lieu of coin, he may, at his option, issue in exchange for said notes an equal amount of coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, and of denominations of fifty dollars, or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value, at the pleasure of the United States, after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest, payable quarterly in coin, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. And the Secretary of the Treasury may reissue the United States notes so received, either to purchase or redeem the public debt, or to meet the current payments for the public service. And the said bonds, and the interest thereon, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority; and the said bonds shall have set forth and expressed upon their face the above specified conditions, and shall, with their coupons, be made payable at the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 3. That section 21 of the national-currency act, and the several amendments thereto, so far as they restrict the amount of notes for circulation under said act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that section 1 of the "act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, be amended by repealing the second proviso in said section contained. And all banks organized under this section shall be subject to, and be governed by, the rules, restrictions, and limitations, and possess the rights, privileges, and franchises, now, or hereafter to be, prescribed by law as to national banking associations, with the same power to amend, alter, and repeal provided by the "national-currency act," approved June 3, 1864; and section 6 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, be, and is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 4. That within thirty days after circulating notes to the amount of $1,000,000 shall be issued to national banking associations under the preceding section, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to 50 per cent. of the circulating notes so issued, which shall be in further reduction of the volume of $400,000,000 fixed by the preceding section; and such reduction shall continue until the aggregate amount of United States notes outstanding shall be $300,000,000. And for that purpose he is authorized to issue and sell at public sale, after ten days' notice of the time and place of sale, a sufficient amount of the bonds of the United States, of the character and description prescribed in the second section of this act, for United States notes to be then retired.

SEC. 5. That each national banking association, now organized or hereafter to be organized, shall keep and maintain, as a part of its reserve required by law, one-fourth part of the coin received by it as interest on bonds of the United States deposited as security for circulating notes or Government deposits; and that hereafter only one-fourth of the reserve now prescribed by law for national banking associations shall consist of balances due to an association available for the redemption of its circulating notes from associations in cities of redemption, and upon which balances no interest shall be paid.

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any increase of the principal of the public debt of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Secretary will send the amendment to me I will explain it briefly. Perhaps this is an ineffective attempt, which presents——

Mr. HOWE. If my friend will allow me, has he any objection to having the amendment printed and going into executive session, and taking the vote to-morrow?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to explain it first, and then I will not object.

This modification of the bill reported by the Committee on Finance is an attempt made, if possible, to get the consent of the Senate to accompany this measure of an increase of paper money with some plan of redemption. I need not say that, in many of its provisions, it does not meet my approval; but I have endeavored, after consulting with Senators on both sides who represent different ideas, to get, if possible, some plan, something that looks like a redemption of our paper money.

The bill as it now stands is simply an increase of greenbacks and an increase of bank notes without limit, without restraint, without redemption——

Mr. LOGAN. Not without limit.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is true it is limited to $800,000,000; but there is no redemption; no fulfillment of our pledge or promise.

In the first section of this amendment I have adopted the language already adopted by the Senate fixing the full amount of United States notes at $400,000,000. In the second clause, which provides for the redemption in coin or bonds, I have adopted the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] postponing this until the 1st of January, 1877, which is after the presidential election.

The third section of the bill, which was free banking upon the basis of New York, is stricken out in order to meet the sentiment of Senators like the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] who desired free banking, and also the Senator from Illinois, who seemed to be very anxious to secure free banking. As banking upon the basis of the State of New York is practically free banking, I have adopted that expedient, simply repealing all restriction upon the amount of bank-paper money that may be issued; so that this bill provides for free banking without limitation as to amount and only subject to the conditions that follow.

Then the fourth section provides that instead of 70 per cent. of greenbacks to be retired there shall be a reduction of 50 per cent. of greenbacks; so that whenever $1,000,000 of bank-notes are issued, $500,000 of legal-tender notes will be retired and canceled.

These are the only changes made in the bill reported by the committee; and I desire one single vote to test the sense of the Senate as to whether in connection with this plan of issuing $90,000,000 of paper money there is a disposition not to do anything whatever, however moderate and limited, however feeble and indirect it may be, toward the redemption of these promises.

That is all there is in the bill. The essential modifications are in the postponement of the time of the taking effect of the second section; also inserting free banking instead of qualified free banking, as originally proposed, and in reducing the amount of greenbacks to be retired from 70 to 50 per cent.

Again, without repeating the argument I have gone over, I do say that for the Senate at this period, after five years have elapsed since the act to strengthen the public credit, to increase to the extent of $90,000,000 our paper money without some promise of redemption it seems to me would be utterly indefensible. I feel that in resisting the inflation of our paper money I have stood by the position that we took during the war, when we issued this paper money only to save our arms from overthrow, when we resorted to it as a dire necessity, when the national banks were intended merely to supersede the State banks. Now, long after the war is over, after its necessity has ceased, an increase of this irredeemable paper money, without any plan or promise of redemption, seems to me not only indefensible, but I would use a much harsher and much stronger term.

This measure does not meet my approval in every respect. I will vote for it if a majority of the Senate choose to adopt it.

Mr. CONKLING. You mean your amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, the amendment as it stands. I will vote for it, and join in the responsibility of increasing our paper money both in greenbacks and bank-notes if you will connect with that even the feeble efforts pointed out in this bill to make those promises at some time convertible into gold. Otherwise, having done all that I could at least to oppose an increase of paper money without some kind of redemption, I shall content myself with voting against the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the amendment be printed, so that we may see what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio a question with reference to his fourth section. I understand him to fix the maximum limit of United States notes at $400,000,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand that the effect of this amendment will be to issue $36,000,000 of national-bank notes before any greenbacks shall be retired?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; whenever any bank-notes are issued in excess of the present amount, there will be a corresponding reduction of the limit of United States notes.

Mr. MORTON. Commencing at $382,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I submit the $400,000,000 is not necessary.

Mr. SHERMAN. The reduction commences upon the basis of $400,000,000 of greenbacks; but, as a matter of course, whenever bank-notes are issued from this time forth to the amount of $1,000,000 there will be a reduction of greenbacks to the amount of $500,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Then there will be a reduction at once from the $382,000,000 and not a reduction from the $400,000,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all; the limit is fixed at $400,000,000; and I will state that in the present condition of our currency, with $382,000,000 outstanding, under the operation of this bill $36,000,000 of increased bank-paper money may be issued before you will get down to the present volume of legal-tender notes, because $36,000,000 of bank paper may be issued under the operations of this bill before the limit of United States notes is reduced to $382,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. That is, before any greenbacks are withdrawn, there is to be an issue of $36,000,000 of national-bank notes. If that is the intention, I submit to the chairman that it will be better to so provide in the substitute, that there may be no mistake about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is provided so clearly and distinctly that it cannot be misunderstood, and it is so understood at the Treasury; that is, you have fixed the limit at $400,000,000; the limit of greenbacks is reduced from $400,000,000 down—there is $382,000,000 outstanding now—and they may be issued to-morrow or the next day, whenever your bill passes; but the effect is to take the limit of $400,000,000 of greenbacks, and reduce that limit down, down as the bank-notes are issued. That is the effect of it, and is understood to be the effect of it, and it is distinctly so worded in language that I think cannot be mistaken.

Mr. LOGAN. Let us have it read again.

Mr. HOWE. Let us have it printed. ["No!" "No!"] Why not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORTON and others. I hope not.

Mr. HOWE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Dorsey, Fenton, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Howe, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Stewart, Stockton, and Wadleigh—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Spencer, Thurman, Tipton, West, and Windom—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Conover, Davis, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hamlin, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Ransom, Sprague, Stevenson, and Wright—17.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOWE. On reflection I am very glad the Senate did not consent to go into executive session. I thought I should like to know what this amendment is; it is a pretty long one; and it would not be unreasonable to ask to see it in print before I voted for it; but on second thought, I am quite ready to vote for it without knowing what it is. [Laughter.] I can give the most satisfactory reason in the world for doing so. I think every Senator ought to vote for it. It will have one good effect: it will kill the pending bill.

Mr. MORTON. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HOWE. That will be a happy murder, even if we have to turn around and hang the amendment for the murder afterward. I may participate in that operation; but I shall vote now for the substitute.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio as a choice between two evils; but the amendment of the Senator from Ohio contains provisions which I cannot vote for if it shall be carried as a substitute for the bill reported by the committee. However, I shall vote for the amendment, and afterward vote against it if it be adopted.

Mr. MORTON. I thank the Senator for his statement.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I should be unwilling to vote for free banking until we reached the time of specie resumption. I should be unwilling to vote for free banking without retiring the greenbacks, commonly so called, as fast as we issue bank-notes. I shall therefore vote for this proposition as an amendment; but if it carries, I shall then vote against it.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is precisely my position. If any bill is going to pass, I should prefer to see this substitute passed. I will vote to adopt it as an amendment. I will not vote for it after it is adopted by the Senate.

Mr. SCHURZ. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] that there is certainly as much free banking in this substitute as he desires.

Mr. SHERMAN. And put in for his special benefit.

Mr. SCHURZ. Yes, put in to secure his vote. I will add there are several things in it which I do not approve of; but I shall vote for this amendment in preference to the substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. CAMERON. I am very sorry that I do not see this matter in the same light that my friends do; but it has often been my misfortune that I could not see things exactly as other men did. I think this proposition offered by the Senator from Ohio is a mere delusion. There is no free banking in it, there is no currency in it, there is no addition to the banking circulation in it.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is free banking in it certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I shall vote for this amendment under the hope and expectation that if it be adopted we may move some amendments to it to make it more acceptable to us. There are some provisions in it which I do not fancy; but I prefer it to the original proposition, and shall vote for it with the hope and expectation that if it is adopted we shall arrive at something definite by which we can regulate our future conduct in framing some measure calculated to restore the credit of the country and resume specie payments.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] rather than the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] has expressed the idea with which I shall vote for this amendment. Should it carry now, whether in the end I shall vote for it or not will depend entirely upon the changes which it may undergo. Therefore, meaning to be perfectly frank about it, I cannot say I shall not vote against it in the end. I vote for it now as an improvement upon the pending proposition, as I think.

Mr. SCOTT. Had there not been such a number of avowals by Senators that they would vote for this amendment as a substitute, and then against it, I would not have deemed it necessary to say a word, but I shall vote for it, and if it is adopted I shall be content to vote for it in the end, and accept it as the best that can be obtained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAYARD, (when his name was called.) On this question I have consented to pair with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] He would vote "nay" if here, and I should vote "yea."

Mr. MITCHELL, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] I should vote "nay," and he, if here, would vote "yea."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE.] I should vote "yea," and he would vote "nay."

Mr. STOCKTON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.] I should vote "yea," and he would vote "nay."

I desire also to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. CONOVER] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON,] who was obliged to leave the city.

The call of the roll having been concluded,

Mr. MITCHELL. I have been informed that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] opposed a similar proposition of this kind; and for fear I might do injustice to him I make this statement at this time, as I said I was paired with him when my name was called.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Kelly, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Thurman, and Wadleigh—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Tipton, West, and Windom—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Conover, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Gordon, Hager, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Ransom, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, and Wright—21.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SCHURZ. Unless some one else desires to amend this bill I shall offer a last amendment. It seems we have now arrived at the end of the debate; but I would suggest to Senators of the majority that this bill is incomplete; it is by no means certain to accomplish the objects which they desire to reach. They will remember that at the beginning of this debate we had some discussion as to the manner in which the $18,000,000 should be set afloat so as to be sure to flow into the business channels of the country. The Senator from Michigan this afternoon said that the $26,000,000 already put into circulation had reached those business channels, on which I am sorry to disagree with him. Those $26,000,000 are in the vaults of the banks of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia. Now, you undoubtedly want this additional issue to go "where it will do the most good." You do not desire it to stay in the eastern banks; you do not want it to become mere food for the gamblers; you want it to accomplish something good; you want it especially to go to the West and South; and yet no way has been suggested in which the Secretary of the Treasury is so to issue this additional currency as to make sure the desired object. In order to cover this obvious and fatal deficiency, I shall now suggest an amendment to be attached to the last section of the bill. It is as follows:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, in putting into circulation the full maximum amount of $400,000,000 of United States notes, to take such measures as will not fail to prevent any additional issues of such notes from falling into the hands of the speculators and stock-gamblers of the country, and also from remaining in the Eastern States, [laughter;] but he will cause such additional issues of legal-tender currency to be fairly and impartially distributed among the people of the West and South; and then, when any community in the West and South desires to establish a national bank, the Secretary of the Treasury will furnish them an ample supply of United States bonds, on which they may obtain the proper proportion of national-bank currency.

And the Secretary of the Treasury is further directed to see to it that the currency be not depreciated by expansion, but that it be elastic in volume and strictly stable in value, [laughter;] or if that cannot be accomplished, he will so judiciously arrange the depreciation of the currency that the debtors of the country be relieved of as large as possible a part of their burdens, while the creditors shall not suffer any loss, [laughter;] but the Secretary will take care that among the debtors so benefited shall not be those who by overtrading or reckless speculation or gambling involved themselves in heavy liabilities, and who now desire to pay a less value than they owe.

The Secretary of the Treasury will take especial care that the laboring men and the men of small means, to whom the trust companies, savings-banks, national and State banks, and employers owe over $1,000,000,000 in deposits and unpaid wages, do not suffer any loss in the value of such debts due them, and that the two hundred and fifty thousand maimed soldiers and soldiers' widows and orphans, who receive $30,000,000 of pensions annually, be not robbed of any part of the value of such pensions through such depreciation of the currency.

And the Secretary of the Treasury is further directed to inquire on the first day of each month whether there is an equal distribution per capita of the currency, as between England and France and the United States, and also in the different States and Territories of this Union, [laughter,] and whether every citizen of the United States can get his notes discounted at a conveniently low rate of interest; and if he finds that such is not the case, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make further additions to the currency, until the circulation per capita, as above, is fairly equalized, and until every citizen of the United States can get his notes discounted at such rates of interest as he desires. [Laughter.]

And the Secretary of the Treasury will steadily continue such additions to the currency until every citizen of the United States has enough, and until the country is entirely relieved of its present public debt, and of any further necessity of borrowing money abroad for the construction of railroads and other public improvements, [laughter,] so that all the interest now paid on such debts may be kept at home; and when this is accomplished, the Secretary of the Treasury shall forthwith resume specie payments without any shock to the business of the country. [Laughter.]

Now I am sure that this embodies all the objects which the majority design to reach. I know it is not exactly in a legislative shape, but I throw it out as a suggestion to the majority, who may put it in better form.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that amendment. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not before the Senate. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole?

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one defect in the bill that I wish to call the attention of the Senate to, and that is there is no clause repealing section 6 of the act of 1870, providing for the transfer of $25,000,000 of the national-bank currency. I wish to know whether the Senator from North Carolina desires that to be left to be carried into execution?

Mr. MERRIMON. I desire that the law shall remain just as it is.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply call attention to the fact that section 6 stands unrepealed, and it will be somewhat embarrassing.

Mr. MORTON. It will be about as valuable in the future as it has been in the past.

Mr. SHERMAN. As the Senator himself drew it I suppose it will.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. CONKLING. On the passage of the bill let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I had hoped when the discussion of this question first commenced that we would do something to meet the expectations of the country; that we would adopt some measure to place the financial condition of this country where the people might repose upon the idea that we would at some time arrive at specie payments. But, sir, any hope that was indulged upon that point I think has now disappeared. We have adopted in Committee of the Whole, and are about to pass in the Senate, a measure which increases the irredeemable circulation of this country $90,000,000, and without a single provision connected with it or annexed to it that looks to the redemption of that circulation at any time in the future. Every proposition which has been made by gentlemen desiring to perfect that bill, and to let the public mind have an idea that we would at some day return to specie payments, has been voted down by the friends of this inflation of the currency. Indeed there has been rebuke after rebuke administered to gentlemen who have sought to put the bill in such a shape, and the friends of inflation on this floor have claimed the exclusive right of perfecting the bill, and yet there is not a single provision connected with the bill to-day that looks to the redemption of the circulation which they are about to increase at any time in the future. If there is, such a provision has escaped my attention. To-day, when a proposition was made to restrict this matter, providing that the public debt should not be increased by reason of the legislation now about to be had, that was voted down.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] a few days ago very triumphantly said that the friends of this measure would take the responsibility of it. Sir, I want them to take the whole responsibility. When the cereals of the farming and agricultural interests of the West are being paid for in depreciated paper money I want him to meet the constituency of the West and take the full measure of the responsibility which he so valiantly assumes on this floor. I want my friend from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] the leader of this measure, who has marshaled his political friends so successfully in advocacy of it, to meet also the responsibility. I congratulate him that he had not only been able on this occasion to call around him his own republican friends, but he has invaded our ranks, and, I am sorry to say, has gathered recruits from the democracy. But while I congratulate him for his skill in marshaling the hosts of the inflationists on this occasion, I point him to the day of reckoning when the people of this country will demand to know why the paper currency of this country was inflated when it was already accumulated in the eastern banks. I want my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] who has so effectually assisted in this measure, which I believe to be ruinous to the best interests of the country, to take his full share of the responsibility which I know the people of this country will hold the inflationists in the Senate to for their action in this matter. I want the gentlemen who have expressed their willingness to take the responsibility in this matter to take it. For one I wash my hands of it. I will vote against the measure. I would vote against it every day in the year to the latest day that I have a seat in this body.

I did not intend that this measure should pass without at least expressing my objections to it in every possible shape, even to the last stage in which it shall be before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, when the present session of Congress opened, the country had been visited with severe financial disaster. The causes of the panic, so called, are known to all observing and reflecting men, and there can, I think, be little doubt what its causes were. It did not happen because there was not currency enough to transact all the actual business of the country. On the contrary, with gold and silver virtually banished from circulation, the currency had nearly doubled in twenty years—doubled not merely in the total, but also in the rate counted by population. In 1850 the coin and note circulation of the country was ten dollars and a half per capita; in 1860 the coin and note circulation was eleven dollars and thirty cents per capita; in 1870 the note circulation alone was eighteen dollars and forty-two cents per capita, and gold at the same time paid duties and did other commercial offices.

Currency famine was not the disorder of which trade fell sick in September, 1873. The nature and state of the currency, not the lack of currency, explains the shipwrecks of last year in so far as they are due to paper money. No currency can be safe and sound unless it be stable. Currency cannot be stable unless its value be fixed and tangible; and if it be not exchangeable into coin, or exchangeable for anything coin will buy, currency must fluctuate with the vibrations of trade and speculation.

For years our currency has been infirm, for three reasons:

First. Because its value has ever been changeable and changing, it being not redeemable and not redeemed.

Second. Because it has been ever subject to the shifting will of Congress; and no currency ever can be steadfast or reliable which is tinkered or may be tinkered every year by congressional majorities or congressional combinations.

Third. Because the amount has been arbitrary, being fixed by Congress, instead of being fixed by the laws of trade as the laws of trade will ever adjust a prommissory currency which may be sent home for redemption to be refused and dishonored if it be not paid.

In view of these and other facts, I was ready to vote for free banking. I will vote now for free banking with needed safeguards. The contraction involved in a resumption of specie payments at once by force of legislation, I have not advocated. I know too well the stride the nation took away from the specie standard when the legal-tender policy was adopted, to suppose that stride may be suddenly measured backward now. Free banking, however, might be made, I think it should be made, an instrument for removing the currency from the arena of political and congressional agitation, and also an instrument for the gradual and ultimate return of specie payments. Many plans for such free banking have been proposed; some of them are before the two Houses now. None of them have been adopted. None of them can now it seems command a majority in the Senate.

In their stead the bill before us has now been "perfected," we are told—for such a bill I cannot vote.

It adds $44,000,000 to overdue and unpaid legal-tender notes, and $46,000,000 to irredeemable bank paper now outstanding; and it declares a permanent if not a final departure from honest and solvent principles. I say it adds forty-four millions to the legal-tender notes, because it requires all that sum to be put out and kept afloat. Twenty-six millions have already gone out from the Treasury, but not gone in fact into actual circulation, and it can all be gradually brought back where the residue still is. The payment out of legal-tender notes last September and October, amounting to thirteen millions or thereabout, was in purchase of bonds—the bonds came from savings-banks, and the legal-tender notes received for them were hoarded to provide against a "run." Since October the currents of enterprise have been too sluggish to take up the increased issue, or even to take up the amount which had been active before. In fact therefore nothing of the forty-four million reserve, and little of the legal-tenders paid out by the Treasury just before the reserve was encroached upon, has ever been felt in the channels of trade or exchange. This appears clearly from the large increase of bank deposits of late, and from the glut of money at money centers. Since December the increase of deposits in the banks of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, is $62,630,070—and of legal-tender notes $41,160,070.

As to the issue by the Secretary of the Treasury of the twenty-six millions, I make one remark. I have denied that the Secretary stupidly or wantonly violated the law in paying out these notes. I deny it still. Two Congresses, with the fact brought to their notice, chose to leave open a door; and when, in 1872, $5,000,000 of the same reserve was issued, still Congress refused to close the door. Having myself insisted at the time that the Secretary would, by our non-action, be left to construe doubtful statutes, open to the construction since given them by two Secretaries in succession—having myself moved and urged an amendment to remove the doubt, I will not now turn round and blame the Secretary, instead of blaming Congress for an interpretation given in good faith and acquiesced in, negatively at least, by both Houses. I regret the use made of the reserve, or rather the action of which that use was a part. I think it was not wise or well; but that the law plainly forbade it I do not believe.

The action now proposed, however, puts out all the forty-four millions, and keeps it out permanently, and adds forty-six millions of bank paper besides, thus swelling the paper money $90,000,000. Coupled with this is nothing—nothing even in the distant future, insuring or tolerating any serious step toward final redemption and resumption.

This is inflation, utter and hurtful. Spasmodic relief may come from it, temporary and apparent prosperity may come from it, but it takes no heed of the future except to smooth the way to degradation, disaster, and distress.

Without necessity or even sore temptation to extenuate it, such a policy spurns the experience of all epochs, tramples on reason and right, and violates the pledged faith of the nation as attested by solemn and repeated acts of the American people in Congress assembled, by the avowals of every department of the Government, and by the declarations in national convention of the political party which chose most of us to the seats we hold, and chose also a Chief Magistrate bound by his word against every scheme and device of repudiation and dishonor. I mean so to vote that by my act the record of Congress shall not palter in a double sense, and shall not be stained by a trace of bad faith.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEWART. I do not wish to prolong the debate; but I have been absent for some time on a committee, and have not been able to take part in it; perhaps I should not have done so if I had not been so engaged, because I do not profess to be an expert in matters of finance. But ever since the war, during these discussions, it has been stated that it was desirable to approach specie payments. In almost every debate and on all occasions it has been held out that that was ultimately to be done. It has been presumed that it could be gradually done. Now we find ourselves, after nearly ten years of peace, going in the other direction without a reason or a restraint. I have lost faith in a gradual approach to specie payments. I do not believe we shall ever do it. I do not believe it will ever be accomplished in that way. I believe it would be better to-day if we were issuing $20,000,000,000, to get to the point at once where the paper before it was printed upon would be more valuable than after it was printed on, so that we would have a bottom on which to do business. That would be more beneficial to the country than it would be to pass such a bill as this. This bill simply inaugurates a struggle—a struggle that will divide this country and absorb all other questions. It is the struggle on the one side of those who will seek to have good money—money that will measure values; who will seek to adopt the rules of political economy that the world has recognized from the beginning; and on the other side will be those who want irredeemable money, who want to avoid the payment of their debts, who want to avoid the obligation thatthe nation has incurred, whose road and whose aim is toward repudiation; and this is the greatest step ever taken by the American people toward repudiation. It cannot be justified on the ground of necessity; it cannot be justified on the ground of honesty. It is a step in the wrong direction, which we shall not have the fortitude to retrace gradually. It will go on in the wrong direction until it produces great disaster. An issue is now made that will last for years. The struggle will be severe; the loss to the commerce and business of this country will be immense during the time that is to come while we are getting back to first principles. The time has got to come when the universal measure of value will be established in America; the time has got to come when this country will be solvent; but before it comes we must pass through a period of irredeemable currency and through a long struggle to learn a lesson which we supposed we knew.

I can add nothing to this debate. I simply wanted to make these few remarks to indicate that this was the beginning of a struggle in which there is nothing but disaster until we finally get back to money that has a real purchasing value, a real measure of value that the world recognizes. Until we get back to solvency and honesty the struggle will be severe. It looks as if it would be protracted, because after ten years' talk of gradual resumption we find ourselves taking a leap—not a step, but a leap—in the other direction, refusing to say that we mean anything but expansion, refusing to say that we mean anything but repudiation of our solemn obligation that we would redeem the greenbacks at some time, refusing to say anything, but starting off in the direction of repudiation; and it will be hard to come back gradually. You will come back with a crash; you will come back with such a crash as this country has never seen. You will come back through struggle. The day will be long remembered by the American people when this vote is cast, taking the step we are about to take. I think this is the saddest vote I have ever known to be taken since I have been here; I have seen nothing that bore upon its face so much promise of evil as the step we are now taking.

Mr. SARGENT, (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Fenton, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, and Wadleigh—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Davis, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Tipton, West, Windom, and Wright—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Conover, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Morrill of Maine, Ransom, Sprague, and Stevenson—14.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I have taken no part in this discussion, and I do not propose to delay this vote a moment. I have voted steadily according to my judgment, which accords with the judgment and the interests of those whom I have the honor in part to represent.

We are now about to do an act which has the quality of novelty. In a time of profound peace, with all the elements of prosperity and productiveness in as great abundance as they have ever been, with money exceptionally plentiful, with only that stagnation and hesitation of business which is caused by the apprehension of what we are now about to do, we are proposing to add largely to the paper currency of the country; and in doing that we refuse to take any, the slightest, measure looking to its present or its ultimate redemption or reduction at any time whatever. We are going against all the lessons of history, against all the teachings of experience, and against all the laws of political economy which have been evolved by the observation and the practice of life. I can only enter against it the protest of my vote.

Mr. THURMAN. I doubt very much, Mr. President, whether the history of this or any other country in which free institutions have existed ever presented such a spectacle as we behold here this afternoon. A great party is in power in every department of this Government, executive, legislative, judicial; a great question has arisen in the legislative body of this country, in which that party has a majority of nearly three to one, and the result of four months' deliberation on this question is, that the dominant party, in disregard of the recommendations of its Chief Magistrate, in disregard of the recommendations of its Secretary of the Treasury, in utter contempt of the recommendations of its experienced Committee on Finance, has agreed to adopt the measure of one of the minority of the body. The great republican party of the Senate of the United States has agreed to take the measure of a democrat and place it upon the statute-books of the country, in defiance of the recommendation of its President, in defiance of the recommendations of its Secretary of the Treasury, and in utter scorn and contempt of the recommendation of its Committee on Finance.

Sir, I can take no credit for this triumph that my democratic friend from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] has achieved. The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] were looked upon as that paper-money trinity which was to be exalted above all other gods in the country; but all their glories have gone and faded, and it was reserved for the pine woods of North Carolina to shape the financial destiny of this country. Disband your party, gentlemen. I cannot say that that to which I belong is very solid. [Laughter.] I regret very much that I should have to repeat what was so well said by my friend behind me, that we are nothing but a minority, and whether we are solid or whether we are not solid, we have no power to shape the legislation of this nation.

Mr. STEWART. Take your votes out and we will see how it is.

Mr. THURMAN. As a general rule we certainly have not any power to shape legislation. If you who are three to our one cannot govern the country, it is time for you to abdicate your power and let somebody try a hand at it who can. Mr. President, so much for that.

Upon the measure itself I have a word to say. It simply means that no man of my age shall ever again see in this country that kind of currency which the framers of the Constitution intended should be the currency of the Union; which every sound writer on political economy the world over says is the only currency that defrauds no man; it means that so long as I shall live, and possibly long after I shall be laid in the grave, this people shall have nothing but an irredeemable paper currency with which to transact their business, that currency which has been well described as the most effective invention that ever the wit of man devised to fertilize the rich man's field at the expense of the poor man's brow. I will have nothing to do with it, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, since the introduction of this measure before Congress, I can truly say I have never looked at it or thought of it in any way connected with party politics. I could not have done so. A measure so fraught with sorrow or with benefit to my countrymen could never find me walking by the light of party when I came to consider it. It would have been impossible. I shall not now disguise my great anxiety and my great sorrow for the result of the deliberations of the Senate. I have never begrudged the time that has been occupied by them. I have always thought the attempt to criticise the manner of Senators' debate or the length of the speeches they might make on a subject of this kind as something unwarranted when we consider the gravity of the subject they have before them.

I cannot now take any pleasure, I can gain no relief from my great regret that this has been done by one party or by another. I only thank God that no vote, no thought, no influence of mine at any stage, under any circumstances, has been given to aid in the perpetration of this great wrong upon the people of the United States. It wrongs their character; it wrongs their habits; and it is a dismal day for them when it is enacted. So far, personally, I am glad of the small share I have borne in this debate. I am glad also that of those who act with me generally, those known as democrats, the majority of them in this Chamber have voted, or will vote, in opposition to this measure. This is a matter to me of satisfaction. As I said, the effect of this measure so far transcends mere party questions that I have not thought of it at all in connection with party.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, as I have said nothing on this great subject, as I have felt it proper to pair with a member who is necessarily absent on this final vote, the importance of the vote and its effect upon the future history of our country seem to make it proper that I should occupy a moment or two in expressing my regret at the course the Senate has taken in reference to this question.

While I have said nothing, I have not been an inattentive listener, for none have listened so attentively to the debates on this question as myself. I have looked upon the question, as the Senator from Delaware well said, not as a party question at all. It seems to have divided itself, I regret to say, into something like a sectional question rather than a party question. That is unfortunate, and I think unwise, so far as those who are in favor of this measure are concerned.

The measure itself is an act of national bankruptcy; it is an act which, and much less than which, would have put any individual on this floor within the terms of the bankrupt act which you have recently re-enacted. It is an act of repudiation, and not only an act of bankruptcy and repudiation, but an act of bankruptcy and repudiation for the purpose of keeping in the coffers of this country and preserving to the people of this country money which they are well able to pay. In the history of all time there is no such example of national dishonor. There was an excuse to be made in old continental times when we had no money to redeem our issues with; and that paper, not redeemed at the time it was promised to be, has been kept as an honored memento in many a family, because with all their struggles and trials they were unable to meet it precisely when it was due. Look at the history of all countries; never has a country in prosperity, never has a country in the position in which the Administration and its friends have led the people to believe this country was, and have insisted that it was ever since the end of the war, proposed through its legislative body to say to its people, "We advise you to repudiate a debt which you are well able to pay." No, sir; it is dishonor without an excuse. The poor debtor who, owing to the trials of the panic, is unable to collect the money due by those who owe him, is thrown into bankruptcy, and what is called financial disgrace. Every man can feel kindly in such a case. Thousands and thousands of such men deserve no tone of reproach. But to a country that thinks its prosperity consists in expanding an irredeemable currency, that will make no effort and suggest no proposition to redeem the solemn promises it has previously made, it will be difficult to point in all history.

I simply desired, Mr. President, on my own account, and on account of the people I represent, so that I might not be misunderstood hereafter, to enter my most solemn protest against this day's business.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN and others. Let us vote.

Mr. STEWART. I think we might as well adjourn.

Mr. LOGAN. I never knew such a piece of filibustering in this Senate before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Does the Senator from Nevada move an adjournment?

Mr. STEWART No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. STEWART. If there is to be any further speech-making I should like to adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no speech to make, but wish to say a word——

Mr. STEWART. Then let us have an amendment to the rule to let gentlemen speak as long as they please.

Mr. CONKLING. You cannot injure the bill by speaking.

Mr. STEWART. No; because it cannot be amended.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator will give way to a motion to adjourn I will make that motion.

Mr. DAVIS. I give way.

Mr. STEWART, (at five o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DORSEY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 28, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Howe, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Windom—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Spencer, Tipton, West, and Wright—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Conover Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamlin, Ransom, Sprague, and Stevenson—15.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the passage of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. I was in hopes that the bill would be amended in such a way that I should be able to vote for it; and had not the sixth section, which provides "that nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any increase of the principal of the public debt of the Unites States," been stricken out I could have voted for it. I am not willing to give my vote to any bill which will allow any of the officers of this Government to increase the public debt. For that reason I shall vote against the bill. I know, however, that the bill will pass and that my vote will not change the result.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, to those of us who look upon the passage of this bill as a great calamity to the country there is something in the reflection that there is yet a hope in another department of the Government. This Administration was elected upon certain principles and pledges distinctly announced and advocated before the people and distinctly accepted by them. This bill tramples upon nearly every one of the pledges which were given as financial propositions to the people. I say, sir, that for one I derive very much comfort from the belief that there is another department of the Government that may review our action and that may set right that which is done wrongly by us.

It has been said here that from this day a new division is drawn between the statesmen and the politicians of the country; that there is a new division of parties. I think that that is true. I believe that there are men in the East and in the West—I refer to the far West and the far East—men of power representing those large constituencies, speaking for large bodies of men who will see any party perish and any man perish who leads a party which lends itself to the destruction of the national credit, which floods this country with irredeemable paper, which reverses all the lessons—ay, sir, and all the pledges—of the past.

I do not believe there is any issue now before the American people growing out of the recent war now unsettled, if there have been such in the past, that is of the momentous consequence to this American people that the question is, shall we have a sound currency, shall we have a sound national credit, shall we preserve our honor in the eyes of the world, in the full blaze of this day, shall we preserve our honor, or shall we trample it under foot? That is the issue being decided at this moment, and as men shall range themselves upon that issue, I say to them, no matter what their ambition may be or what their expectations may be, there are men in their party and out of it who will scorn to follow a leadership which has once betrayed the pledges and principles of the party. Ay, sir, if there were anything binding me to allegiance to a banner led by such men, I would emancipate myself from it, for I do believe that high above all party organizations are the principles which are to be illustrated and enforced by those organizations, and high above all expediency is the question of national honor.

I shall vote against this bill knowing that it will pass. I shall vote against it as the last protest which I can make against it, and then, sir, my hope is elsewhere that it may fail.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, the few words I am going to say will, I hope, be the last speech delivered on this bill. Nobody can have listened to the speeches which followed the close of the general debate without being struck by the similarity which they bore to funeral orations, [laughter,] such as we are in the habit of hearing here when we celebrate the memory of some departed friend. Gentlemen speak of the two great political parties of the land as having so grievously sinned against common sense, against the best interests of the country, against their proclaimed policies, that they can live no longer, and that now the time of their final dissolution has evidently come. Be it so. As to that, I have no tears to shed. But, sir, I cannot, in the face of what is now to be done here, and which has been very nearly accomplished, refrain from speaking a word, not for a party, but for the country. Contemplating this legislation, I feel humiliated as an American citizen. To think that here in the light of the nineteenth century, with all the experiences of history before us, the American people, who have been so proud of standing in point of popular intelligence at the head of the nations of the world, should repeat an act of bad faith which at the same time is a blunder and a folly, and which never was attempted without resulting in disaster and shame—I say I cannot think of this without feeling that this country stands at this moment humbled before the world. Gentlemen of the majority may think they have achieved a triumph; but I tell them the time is not far when they will curse the hour which witnessed their alliance with so fatal a cause; and before many years have elapsed those who stood here true to the cause of justice and reason will point with pride to the votes they have given and to the words they have spoken. Although overwhelmed by numbers to-day, their triumph is sure. Nor do I think the day is far off when that portion of the American people who now give themselves up to so strange an infatuation will recover their sound senses and indignantly shake off the rule of that statesmanship which is now so busy to lead the country on toward ruin and disgrace.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I ought to be the wisest man on finance that the country can afford. I have listened to some seventy-five speeches which have been made directly at my innocent ears. But I congratulate the Senate that they are in no danger that I shall pour back upon them what I have received, either in its crude form or in any digested style. I shall not discuss this great financial problem in the eight minutes that are now left of my time. I only rise to say to our friends outside of the Senate that the reason we sit here silently and are basted and roasted and turned to-day like chickens on spits, is that we are anxious to settle this question. We have resolved among ourselves to say nothing more about it, but confine ourselves to voting; that when smitten upon one cheek we will turn the other also, and always vote.

Mr. FLANAGAN. ["Vote!" "Vote!"] When my friends appeal to me to let them vote, I can tell them I am anxious to vote. It is a thing, however, that I have not been able to do for about two months, having foolishly paired off; but having the opportunity now to make a few remarks, I avail myself of the privilege. [Laughter.]

My distinguished friend who has just occupied the floor says he ought to be the smartest man here. Well, he is very smart, but that does not settle this question; nor have I the time to pursue him further. But, sir, there is one fact I recollect. Early in this session, in the first days of January, when my friends were after me and a few others who were similarly situated, who were too weak-kneed to continue to stand by me, I then asked them to bear in mind and I admonished them to get their wash-bowls ready and their clean towels, pure water, and beautiful soap that there would be no mistake in, that they would be called on to wash their hands, the eyes of this great nation being upon them for votes that they would be required to cast upon this very subject. The "salary grab," as it was termed, was a matter that could not be seen with the mightiest telescope that is known to the American nation in comparison with the question now presented to us; and the people will feel it and the legislators will realize it. There is a line, and it is a broad line; clear and unmistakable, as has been already stated by my distinguished friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] of the democratic party, and by my distinguished friend on the other side of the question from California [Mr. SARGENT] representing the republican party. The Senator from California has seen proper to speak of that which we all knew, that there is a power which may yet interfere and save this nation. Upon that branch of the subject I am clearly convinced of a fact that I think is equally clear to the balance of the Senate, that that glorious achievement of the President of the United States which was consummated under the apple-tree at Appomattox will dwindle into a small matter when compared with the great effort if he will exercise the power that the Constitution has given him to veto this bill that we are about to pass. It will make him stronger in this nation than his mighty efforts when he led the valiant soldiers of the American nation to put down the rebellion. I have no hesitancy about saying this. This question is to be felt; and I am proud to know on this occasion, as has been well said, that it has been no party question. But what are the facts? The responsibility is still upon us as republicans. The democrats can take care of themselves. They have done it well; they have done it nobly; they have done it magnanimously; but what are the facts? In our Philadelphia platform we are bound by solemn pledge as well as the statutes of the United States declare that we should and would do a particular thing; and now to spread $90,000,000 broadcast over the country and repudiate everything that we have done heretofore on that branch of the subject—I say it will be hard for that to be explained satisfactorily to the people of this great nation. It cannot be done; it will be a foul slander upon them to say that it should be done. It cannot, nor will it be.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I do not rise to make a speech, but I have listened to the speeches of some of the gentlemen with amazement. Senators speak to us as if we were unpatriotic, as if the majority that is to pass this bill knew not really what it was doing, as if it was composed of Senators unpatriotic and lacking in intelligence. They speak to us of an elevated position, as if we were about to bring this country into deep disgrace; and they express the great pain and sorrow under which they are laboring because we are about to inflict on this country this terrible calamity. I look upon this measure as one of enlightened policy, as one of great wisdom, as one of great statesmanship; and I believe the men who are voting for this measure are the men who realize to-day the terrible necessity under which the western country is now suffering. They are wise, intelligent, brave men in this body who, knowing the wrongs which my section of the country is suffering to-day, assume the responsibility here of voting for this measure. I feel that responsibility, and, without pretending to be deeply versed in finance, certainly without the pretensions of some of the gentlemen who have spoken on the other side, without any pretensions approaching to what they set up for on this floor, I believe I have some understanding on this subject.

I am not to learn to-day that gold is better than paper money. I am not to learn to-day that gold is the standard of the commercial nations of the world. These things are known to all the Senators on this floor; and if we had not known them before, they have been repeated and repeated here a hundred times during this debate. Grant all this to be so. Knowing it to be so myself, I still am aware of the condition of the vast section from which I come, and I am aware of the condition of the southern country, and I say that this measure is one of absolute necessity to relieve them from their prostrate condition. It is the only measure to infuse life into them again. It is the only measure by which and with which blood can again be put into their veins; and unless some measure of this kind be passed by this Congress at this session, the whole western country will be brought to bankruptcy and to ruin. Knowing that to be the fact, I have been amazed that gentlemen coming from that section have been led off by the conviction that gold being better than paper money, they would afford us no relief whatever, knowing well that the section whence they come needed that relief. Whether we be right or whether we be wrong, such is our conviction, and we ought not to be charged with a want of patriotism. Nor are we to be called so ignorant as not to know what the country needs, and to be told that this measure is not one to relieve their wants.

Mr. President, I did not rise to make a speech at this late date. I felt that a few words at least were due to me and to my friends to vindicate ourselves from the position in which Senators have attempted to place us, as men ignorant and unpatriotic. I repel both charges.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, there will be an opportunity to reply to the most extraordinary speeches I have ever listened to in this body. They will go upon the record, and that opportunity will be improved hereafter. I forbear for the present, so far as I am concerned. I ask a vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, (at six o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

["O, no!" "O, no!"]

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask for the yeas and nays. We might as well take them first as last.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. ENAMELING MOLDING-MACHINE.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, presented the following memorial; which was referred to the Committee on Patents:

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, manufacturers of moldings and frames, of the city of Cincinnati, would most respectfully call the attention of your honorable body to the fact that vigorous efforts are made by certain speculators, before the Senate Committee on Patents, to effect the extension of a certain patent known as the Marcher patent, on a machine for enameling moldings.

Against the granting of an extension of said patent we, the undersigned, protest, for the following reasons, namely:

First. After the granting of said patent in 1851 grave doubts were entertained whether said Robert Marcher, to whom the patent was granted, really was the inventor of said machine, as it was shown in court at Philadelphia that the machine in question had been in use for many years previous to the issue of the said patent.

Secondly. Admitting that Robert Marcher was the inventor of the machine even in part, (which we do not admit,) then, and in that case, the invention was not the result of any series of experiments or the cause of any large expenditure of thought or money on his part, the former practical workings of other machines furnishing all the necessary basis by which to improve, complete, or perfect an apparatus which was an improvement only in the process of enameling moldings, they having been enameled or prepared with the same materials and results for over fifty years.

Thirdly. The original cost of the machine in question does not exceed the sum of three dollars, while Robert Marcher charged five dollars for the machine, besides a per annum royalty of $100 for the use of each machine; the machine itself being an apparatus which can be made by any ordinary mechanic, and did not necessitate the erection of any machinery on his part to produce it.

Fourthly. The said patent has been renewed twice, and for a period of twenty-one years has been a source of enormous income to said Robert Marcher and his heirs, who during the aforesaid period have collected said royalty from all the molding manufacturers throughout the country, and thereby received more than sufficient remuneration for what Robert Marcher claimed as his invention.

Fifthly The extension of said patent is now sought by speculators, to whom the said patent was assigned in part after its second expiration by Mr. Marcher's widow, and who can claim no merit whatever in the matter of this invention.

Sixthly. The use of the machine in question, after having richly remunerated the so-called inventor and his heirs, now benefits the public at large; while if an extension of the patent should be granted many manufacturers directly, and the community indirectly, would suffer for the sake of benefiting a few speculators.

In consideration of all these facts we would respectfully request the Senate and House of Representatives to refuse an extension of the patent in question.

We, the undersigned, believe the representation made above to be true, and further believe that the refusal of the granting of the extension of this patent would not only be the relief of a burden to all manufacturers of moldings in the United States, but also indirectly a material benefit to the many workmen they employ.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. COBURN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted a report upon the reduction of the military establishment, and in relation to fortifications and works of defense; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

IMPROVEMENT OF HARBOR OF NEW YORK.

Mr. WOODFORD, by unanimous consent, presented the following memorial; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

To the Senators and Members of Congress representing the State of New York:

Your memorialists, the pilot and harbor commissioners of the port of New York, having in view the importance of preserving and improving, as far as practicable, the harbor of New York, at which the greater portion of the national customs is collected, and in the safety and convenience of whose navigation the commerce of the whole country is interested, respectfully ask that you will use your influence to obtain the appropriation by Congress of the amounts asked for by General John Newton, in his annual report, to be applied to the removal of impediments to navigation in the harbor, to wit:

For improvements of the East River	$600,000
For improvement of the Harlem River	170,000
Being a total of	770,000

Believing that the application of this amount, under the able direction of General Newton, will produce improvements of sufficient importance to amply compensate for the expenditure.

Dated New York, March 31, 1874.

By order of the board of commissioners of pilots.

Mr. WOODFORD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2864) to authorize the improvement of the harbor of New York, and appropriating moneys therefor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INDIANS TO TESTIFY IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. SHANKS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2865) to make Indians witnesses in the United States courts, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DUTY ON IMPORTED FRUITS.

Mr. KASSON. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Ways and Means, with an amendment, the amendment of the Senate to House bill 2191, in relation to the customs duties on imported fruits.

The amendment of the Senate was to add to the bill these words:

Except in cases where suits in court have been discontinued by instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the error in the punctuation of the clause relating to fruit-plants in the fifth section of the act approved June 6, 1872, entitled "An act to reduce duties on imports and to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," by inserting a comma instead of a hyphen after the word "fruit," is hereby corrected; and said clause shall read as follows: "fruit-plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation or cultivation."

The Committee on Ways and Means recommend the amendment to be concurred in with the following amendment:

Provided, That the duties imposed by virtue of this amendment shall not be levied or collected upon fruits entered for consumption at any port of entry prior to July 1, 1874.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the effect of this bill in stopping suits?

Mr. KASSON. The Senate amendment provides that where suits have been discontinued by order of the Department, the amount due shall be paid, because parties have lost their remedy by agreement with the Department.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the bill read as a whole, because I recollect that the House put an amendment upon it providing that a decision of the highest court should be had before any money should be paid out upon these claims.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first read the bill as it passed the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to suspend the repayment of all duties heretofore paid on imported fruits until further legislation by Congress authorizing the same, or until the final decision of the Supreme Court.

The SPEAKER. The bill comes back from the Senate with an amendment, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

Except in cases where suits in court have been discontinued by instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the error in the punctuation of the clause relating to fruit-plants in the fifth section of the act approved June 6, 1872, entitled "An act to reduce duties on imports and to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," by inserting a comma instead of a hyphen after the word fruit is hereby corrected; and said clause shall read as follows: "Fruit-plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation or cultivation."

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Ways and Means recommend that the Senate amendment be concurred in, with the addition of a proviso, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the duties imposed by virtue of this amendment shall not be levied or collected upon fruits entered for consumption at any port of entry prior to July 1, 1874.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to state that the House, by an overwhelming majority, inserted in this bill an amendment providing that no money should be paid out of the Treasury on this account until the highest court had determined that the United States Government must refund. Now, sir, the amendment of the Senate nullifies entirely that provision of the bill as it went from the House, and provides that a discretion shall be given to the Secretary of the Treasury to refund these duties where suits have been discontinued by him, perhaps under the advice of the Attorney-General of the United States.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me to explain? The amendment of the Senate is designed simply to cover cases where suits have been commenced by regular proceedings and the parties have acquired a vested right to have the duties returned, and by agreement with the Treasury Department, to save costs to the United States, the suits have been discontinued. These suits amount to $37,000 all told. By the discontinuance of those suits the parties have lost their rights unless they be preserved in the form here proposed. When this matter was presented to the Senate committee they saw at once that we could not repudiate that arrangement; for unless their rights be saved by the amendment these parties, who would have obtained decisions in their favor, will be deprived by our bill of the opportunity of recovering. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] may be correct in stating that only $37,000 is involved in this case so far as the Treasury Department is aware. But, sir, the habit of these importers of fruits in New York and elsewhere is to deposit a large sum of money, leaving the question open as to how much the Government will claim on the fruits, because frequently fruits are so much damaged as to be worthless, and therefore duty is not chargeable upon them. Now of these large sums deposited in the sub-treasury at New York and elsewhere I am credibly informed, notwithstanding the statement of the Treasury Department, that $190,000 has been paid out on account of these fruits to a single firm. Now what I desire to have kept in the bill, without impairment, is the proposition requiring a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in every case before duties shall be refunded; in other words, depriving the Treasury Department, either with or without the decision of the Attorney-General, of authority to make this refund.

Mr. KASSON. The House bill is unchanged; the Senate has not altered a word of the bill which we passed; the clause requiring a final decision of the Supreme Court is retained. The Senate has simply added the provision I have already stated, to preserve rights already vested. That is the only effect of the amendment. If any gentleman desires further information as to the figures I will have read the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing exactly what they are; but it will save time to allow me to say that the amount already refunded is $70,607.52; the amount for which suits have been commenced and discontinued under agreement that the amount claimed should be refunded by the Secretary of the Treasury—the parties having lost their right of continuing the suits—is $37,282.81. The Secretary of the Treasury adds:

The suits in these cases were discontinued by direction of the Department upon the agreement that the Department would refund the amount of duty paid. It is possible there may be a few more claims where protests and appeals have been made, but not yet reported to the Department. I am informed the amount in such cases cannot exceed $10,000.

That is the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MAYNARD. The point I wished to make to the gentleman from Pennsylvania in that connection was whether he was in favor of this further amendment practically making these fruits free until the 1st of next July?

Mr. RANDALL. No; I am in favor of getting all the duty we can, and am against paying out any refund of duty unless it be by decision of the highest court.

Mr. KASSON. I have yielded to my colleague on the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I will occupy the floor but one minute. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is right in part, but the bill as now reported by the committee prevents any further refund of duty until all has been done which he desires to be done. But, sir, there are certain cases which have been dismissed by agreement of the Treasury Department that the refund should be made. The Treasury Department having decided that class of fruits came in free, and suits having been brought, it is only going to unnecessary expense to allow them to be carried on. The Treasury Department having decided in all cases they should be free, agreed, if those who had suits pending dismissed them, to refund duties to them. Parties did dismiss their suits under that agreement, and we are all compelled, whether right or wrong, to stand by that agreement.

A word about these fruits coming in duty free until the 1st of July next. After the decision of the Treasury Department, that those fruits came in free, men went on the faith of that decision and purchased cargoes which are now on their way; contracts were made for the season under the faith of that decision; and it would be oppressive, of course, when the Treasury Department decided their fruits should come in free, and they had made purchases on the ground that they were to come in free, now to impose a tariff on them.

Mr. MYERS. I brought this question up originally and I wish to be heard on it.

Mr. SPEER. Is this proceeding by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPEER. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will allow me to state one reason for my objection.

Mr. KASSON. I am holding the floor by the permission of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SAWYER,] and agreed that if it gave rise to long debate I would withdraw it.

Mr. SAWYER. And I must insist on the agreement being carried out.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentlemen should not forget the ribbon cases, where $900,000 were paid out of the Treasury, taken out of the revenues of the country, upon the mere ipse dixit of the Attorney-General of the United States.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa only holds the floor by permission of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASSON. And in accordance with my arrangement with the gentleman from Wisconsin that I would withdraw the bill if it gave rise to extended debate, I now withdraw it.

Mr. SPEER. Let it be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the Senate amendment also be printed.

Mr. MYERS. And the amendment of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. KASSON. They have all been read and will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. RANDALL. This is a most important question, involving a large sum of money, and ought not to be disposed of hastily.

Mr. KASSON. The bill is not before the House at this time.

Mr. MYERS. As I introduced this subject first before the House, I hope I will be permitted to say a word or two upon it.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House.

WISCONSIN CENTRAL RAILROAD.

Mr. SAWYER. I move to suspend the rules so as to allow the Committee on the Public Lands to report back a bill (S. No. 512) to extend the time for completing the Wisconsin Central Railroad, in Wisconsin, in order that it may be considered at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read. It provides that the time specified in the ninth section of the act of Congress approved May 5, 1864, entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the State of Wisconsin," for the completion of the road mentioned in the third section of said act, and for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by said act to aid in the construction of said road, be, and the same is thereby, extended until the 31st day of December, 1876.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is the motion to bring it before the House simply for consideration?

The SPEAKER. That is all. The question is on seconding the motion for suspension of the rules.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 98, noes 30; no quorum voting.

Mr. RANDALL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SAWYER and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 121, noes 27.

So the House seconded the motion to suspend the rules.

The question recurred on the motion to suspend the rules in order to take up the bill for consideration.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 97, noes 31; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 111; not one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDALL demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted on the motion to suspend the rules, is a further count demanded?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; I demand a further count.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. BRADLEY as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 125, noes 28.

So the rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the committee reported the bill for action by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the bill.

The bill was read again.

Mr. BRADLEY rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire, before the argument begins, to inquire what is the purpose of the gentleman from Michigan as to the latitude of discussion to be allowed?

Mr. BRADLEY. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that this is a question which in my judgment does not need any discussion more than a statement of the case, so that the members of the House may understand what its purport is. This is a Senate bill——

Mr. HOLMAN. Do I understand that the gentleman proposes simply to state the case himself and then to allow no one to be heard against the bill?

Mr. BRADLEY. That is what I intended to indicate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the House will not allow that to be done. We ought to have some discussion on a bill giving away half a million acres of the public lands.

Mr. BRADLEY. After I have made a statement to the House I will then ascertain what is the desire of the House in regard to debate. As I have stated, Mr. Speaker, it is a Senate bill proposing to extend the time for the completion of the Wisconsin Central Railroad. It is a land-grant road, the grant having been made by act of Congress in 1864. Nearly one-half of the time allowed for the completion of the road by the State of Wisconsin elapsed before arrangements were made on the part of the State and any responsible company that would undertake the building of the road; so that the company was not organized and did not enter upon the building of the road until 1869, leaving but five years of time to do what has been done up to the the present time. From the figures that have been submitted to the committee we ascertained that the road is over half completed and in operation; that arrangements have been made and expenses incurred looking to the completion of the balance in a very short period of time. All the company ask in this bill is an extension of time of two years and a half. I will state to the House that before the grant of the lands or the franchises of the company were in any manner incumbered, $1,800,000 of subscribed funds on the part of the company were expended. Since that time four millions of money have been expended in the construction of the road. The company have stated to the committee, and have shown to their satisfaction, that up to the present time they have been acting in good faith, putting forth their best efforts to build the road; knowing, however, early during the past season, that it would be impossible to build it without an extension of time, still they went to work upon it in good faith, believing that a regard to the terms of the contract and good faith on the part of the Government would induce Congress to extend the time as asked in this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will state to the House that the only question revived in this bill at the present time is this: will the House extend the time for the completion of a land-grant railroad under any circumstances? The merits of the case are beyond question. There is no question about the good faith of the company that it will complete this road in the very best manner within the two years and a half of time asked. Under these circumstances, will this House pass this Senate bill and extend the time two years and a half?

The committee have submitted a report with this bill which explains the whole situation. It is indorsed by a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking Congress to extend the time. If any gentleman desires to have it read I will send it to the Clerk's desk for that purpose. I do not care myself to have it read, unless there is some gentleman who desires it.

Believing there is no question about this except the one stated, and that it is useless to take up the time of the House in its discussion, I move the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that that is not good faith. This House voted to consider this bill, and now for the gentleman having charge of it to call the previous question, so that we who stand here opposed to this land grant shall not be heard, is not in good faith.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I suppose the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will not claim that he has been deceived in the matter.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; for I have examined the question thoroughly. I desire to submit a letter from Mr. Drummond, Commissioner of the General Land Office, which will show that this is a land grant, and that those who vote for it must face that question directly.

Mr. BRADLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania ten minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist that, as a matter of common fairness, time for discussion should be allowed.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. We propose to divide the time with the other side.

Mr. SPEER. I have given some attention to what is sought here, and I hope the friends of the measure, those who have it in charge, will not deny to the House a reasonable opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. BRADLEY. I have offered the gentleman from Pennsylvania ten minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to precede what I have to say by submitting a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and while it is being read I ask the House to give it its careful attention.

The Clerk reads as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 3, 1874.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 30th ultimo, requesting to be informed as to the number of acres granted, patented, &c., to the State of Wisconsin for the benefit of the Wisconsin Central Railroad, I have the honor to state the following:

		Acres.
The whole area of the grant under the act of May 5, 1864, is estimated to be		1,800,000
From which deduct the lands sold and otherwise appropriated prior to the date of the grant estimated as		1,050,000
Leaving as inuring under said grant		750,000
Patent No. 1 was issued to the company April 28, 1873, covering	33,708.12
Lists of selections have been filed, embracing in the aggregate	373,408.88
		407,117
Leaving		342,883

that the State and company would receive under an extension of the time as proposed by Senate bill No. 512.

Very respectfully,

WILLIS DRUMMOND,
Commissioner.

Hon. S. J. RANDALL,
House of Representatives.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that the bill making this land grant originally passed the Congress of the United States May 5, 1864, and that the grant, by the limitation of ten years, will expire in less than thirty days from this time. Now, sir, according to the opinion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which has been read, the amount of land actually donated—yes, freshly donated under this act of extension, as it is termed—is 342,000 acres of land. I am unable to say what this passage in the Commissioner's letter means: "Lists of selections have been filed, embracing in the aggregate," &c.; but I judge from it that patents have not been issued for 373,000 acres in addition; so that of patented and unpatented lands this bill actually hands over to this company 716,000 acres.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. DUNNELL. It is whether he would have the Government seize that vast quantity of lands after these men have earned it under the original act?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; but I would have the Government, whenever it makes a gift to a corporation, compel that corporation to live up to the terms of the grant and keep within the restriction of ten years provided for by law.

Mr. DUNNELL. The company has lived up to it.

Mr. RANDALL. I find that the date when the first lands were patented under that law was April 28, 1873, so that during a period of nine years that land was excluded from homestead and pre-emption settlement. I think, for one, that the company in receiving the enormous grant which they have already received obtained enough from the General Government.

Mr. BRADLEY. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. BRADLEY. The lands granted were not withdrawn from settlement and sale until November, 1869, only five years ago.

Mr. RANDALL. I stand corrected on that point.

Mr. ELDREDGE. And let me say further that more than one million acres of the original grant were selected and occupied by settlers.

Mr. RANDALL. That is to say, they were lands sold or otherwise appropriated by act of Congress to other roads.

Mr. SAWYER. No, no.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I desire to ask the gentleman if he calls the State of Wisconsin a corporation?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. This was a grant, as I understand it, to the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. RANDALL. For the benefit of certain corporations.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The State asks an extension of time, having employed a corporation to use the grant for the benefit of the inhabitants of the State.

Mr. RANDALL. The land was originally given to the State of Wisconsin for the purposes of certain corporations, if I recollect aright, and the State has in obedience to that law given this number of acres to this railroad company. The State of Wisconsin, as I said before, will have no claim whatever to these lands within thirty days from now, to wit, on the 5th of May.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would ask the gentleman whether he has read the memorial of the democratic Legislature of Wisconsin?

Mr. RANDALL. I have read everything in the report that comes from the committee with this bill. I have read and carefully considered every line of it, and I have been more pressed to vote for this bill than for any bill I have ever known in this Congress since I have been here; but I feel it my duty, consistently with my past course, and with the unanimous judgment of all the people of the land, to insist that we shall stop just here and cease giving the public lands away.

Mr. SAWYER. This is not giving lands away.

Mr. DUNNELL. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania ever seen a juster or a better case than this?

Mr. RANDALL. I have never seen a land-grant case in the world that was clear to my mind, if that is what you mean.

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not mean that.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, it is time, in my judgment, for this House to halt in giving away the public domain, and I think that this is a fair opportunity, and I believe that it is the first that this House has had, to declare its policy in connection with land grants.

Mr. BRADLEY. The letter from the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, which was read at the Clerk's desk, states the amount of the land appropriated nearly correctly. I find from an executive document filed in the last Congress that the amount of land to which the grant would apply was over two million acres; that owing to the delay in the organization of this company the lands were all entered and taken up except about seven hundred and fifty thousand acres; so that this railroad company engaged to build over four hundred miles of road for a land grant of only seven hundred and fifty thousand acres. They have to-day completed one-half of it, and have incurred large expense toward the completion of the road, and they now ask an extension of time for only two years and a half.

I believe that the House now understands this question well enough. It is simply, will you extend the time under any circumstances in a most favorable and meritorious case? I now call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen from Michigan, Mr. BRADLEY, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, will again act as tellers.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Before the previous question is seconded, I would like to ask the gentleman having charge of this bill if he intends to yield any portion of the hour to which he will be entitled?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will not be entitled to any hour. That is only when a report comes from a committee.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I understood that this came from a committee.

The SPEAKER. Not under a regular call. This is under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will allow some time to the opponents of this bill.

Mr. BRADLEY. The friends of the bill seem to desire that something further shall be said, and I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. McDILL, of Wisconsin. A single statement before the gentleman proceeds. By the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office of 1873 it appears officially that the entire amount of land withheld from market for the benefit of this company was seven hundred and fifty thousand acres. The amount which the company would have been entitled to had the grant been filled is the amount stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] But the selection was not made by the company until 1869, and the Commissioner, on page 283 of his report, says that the entire amount of land withheld from settlement by this road is only seven hundred and fifty thousand acres.

Mr. RANDALL. That is what is stated in the letter which I had read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the belief has been confidently entertained by the people of this country that this policy of monopolizing the public lands by corporations and withdrawing them from homestead settlement had terminated. Even during the last session of Congress, under the pressure of public opinion, this policy practically ceased, and but a single measure was successful. A bill extending a grant made before that time was generally defeated, and such a measure is in fact a new grant. The reason is very obvious. The experience of the country has been that these land grants have been attended not simply by fraud upon the country, but they have drawn upon Congress the most severe calamity that a nation can suffer—the humiliation of the nation in the impeachment of the integrity of its public men, and inflicts a permanent injury upon the country in the monopoly of the public lands, to the permanent injury of the great body of our people, and the equally unjust building up vast fortunes at the public expense.

When Congress entered upon this policy in 1862 of direct grants to corporations every one knew that there was danger of the ultimate result; that credits mobilier were in the nature of things inevitable in connection with these grants. It was hoped in the last Congress that this policy had terminated forever; that the monopoly of the public lands had ceased; and that what remained of our public lands, and what might remain after the grants already made had expired, would go to the benefit of the people under the provisions of the homestead law.

This bill is more objectionable in all its features than any grant of the kind sought to be renewed for many years. This grant is subject to no limitation whatever, and in this renewal no limitation is imposed. This company is not bound to sell these lands to actual settlers and in limited quantities, as in the case of all other grants which have been renewed of late years. There is no limitation to the price of the land. The terms of the act of 1864, passed in the midst of public danger and when public men found it impossible to give careful attention to legislation, make no limitation either on the price or quantity to be sold to each purchaser or any provision for actual settlers. If this bill is carried through to-day—and I always fear when I see a powerful lobby in our halls such as has gathered around this bill—that right or wrong the passage of the measure is inevitable. If this bill shall pass to-day, it will simply give to these gentlemen of Boston—not citizens of Wisconsin, but a body of adventurous speculators from the city of Boston, with a few from New York—a monopoly of these public lands to the extent of three hundred and seventy-three thousand acres, land worth at this time, I am informed, four or five dollars an acre.

Mr. SAWYER. What will it be worth if this road is not built? This company has built two hundred miles of road, one hundred and forty miles in a dense wilderness. They commenced building at both ends of the road and have built to within fifty miles. If they cannot connect those ends of that road, what will this land be worth? It will be entirely worthless.

Mr. HOLMAN. This grant is on the verge of expiring; and this bill makes a new grant of the lands, at least to the extent of three hundred and seventy-three thousand acres. The Boston gentlemen have been upon us for two months pressing this measure. It is not a Wisconsin measure at all.

Mr. SAWYER. If it is not a Wisconsin measure I would like to know what could be a Wisconsin measure. Every foot of this road is in our State, and it is impossible for this company to raise the money to connect the ends of this road unless the Government acts in good faith, and renews this grant, as I believe it ought to and will do.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has my friend looked over this list of gentlemen from Boston and New York, who ask you to give them three hundred and seventy-three thousand acres of land? They are of course wealthy and respectable gentlemen. You do not give special privileges and subsidies to others than influential gentlemen. This is the list:

Gardner Colby, Boston, Massachusetts; R. G. Hazard, Peace Dale, Rhode Island; Moses Taylor, New York; Samuel H. Walley, Boston, Massachusetts; J. Wiley Edmands, Boston, Massachusetts; J. Warren Merrill, Cambridge, Massachusetts; Brewster, Sweet & Co., Boston, Massachusetts; E. F. Waters, Newton, Massachusetts; Albert Vinal, Boston, Massachusetts; R. C. Gregory, Chicago, Illinois; Horatio Lyon, Monson, Massachusetts; Henry Ingalls, Wiscasset, Maine; J. W. Converse, Boston, Massachusetts; Leonard A. Jones, Boston, Massachusetts; D. Mr. SAWYER. The Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which is democratic at this time, asks unanimously for the renewal of this grant.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have heard all that before.

Mr. SAWYER. It is true.

Mr. HOLMAN. When gentlemen remember the power of the lobby here on our own legislation—even over so reputable a body as Congress—when I see the power of the lobby here, I do not doubt its power in Wisconsin or elsewhere.

I have submitted, for the benefit of the country, the names of the wealthy citizens of Boston and New York to whom these three hundred and seventy-three thousand acres of land are to be given and monopolized beyond the reach of laboring men. That these lands are valuable for homesteads, and would be taken up as homesteads, unless the curse of monopoly rests upon them, is shown by the fact that a million acres of the lands were taken for settlement, for it was not until these lands had risen in value to three or four dollars an acre by the industry of the whole country, by the labors of the pioneers who settled around them—it was not till then that these enterprising gentlemen of Boston and New York took hold of the enterprise and proposed to complete the road.

Now, sir, if the Representatives of Wisconsin, for the benefit of their own local interests, were asking the extension of this grant, there might be some apology for it; but the idea of allowing these lands to be used for purposes of mere speculation by direct monopoly should be condemned. Where are the friends of the homestead law? I would even regard this measure as better if the price of the land were limited to $2.50 an acre, and the company were required to sell it to actual settlers in quarter-sections at that price. During the last Congress the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé road, coming here under the unfortunate shadow of the Credit Mobilier affair, offered to limit the price of their lands to $2.50 per acre and to sell to actual settlers only, in quarter-sections; but even under those conditions you refused to grant an extension of time. The Credit Mobilier was fresh in the memory, and the measure failed. But here you are proposing to monopolize this land in the hands of a few wealthy gentlemen, to leave the settlers without any protection whatever, and curse the country by large landed estates. Although it is hoping against hope, I trust the House will here and now and forever put an end to this fatal policy.

Mr. BRADLEY. In answer to the remark of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that this is not a measure in the interest of Wisconsin, I desire to say that the Legislature of that State has sent to Congress a memorial asking that this extension be made. I now yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] inquires "where are the friends of the homestead principle to-day?" I do not recognize in him one of them, for he is endeavoring to-day to take away from the homestead settlers along fifty miles of the line of this road the opportunity to make their lands available. This line of fifty miles has been located and work is now progressing upon it. Settlers have gone in there, and unless this grant of land be given so that the company may be enabled to fill out that gap of fifty miles, the homestead settlers will have no means of transporting their produce to a market, and the gentleman from Indiana will have proved himself their worst enemy.

What has been the policy of the Congress of the United States with regard to the public lands during the last three Congresses? In the Forty-first Congress we made land grants. The voice of the people came up to us against them; and in the Forty-second Congress we granted no additional lands to railroads; but in that Congress, wherever a company came to us showing that it had in good faith endeavored to comply with the law, we extended the time, so far as I now remember, in every case, with the single exception of one railroad.

This company comes here to-day and tells us that it has paid down through its stockholders, $1,800,000 toward the completion of the road; that it has invested in this work $4,000,000 additional in the shape of proceeds of bonds and other obligations, making in all almost $6,000,000 already invested in this road. By reason of the unfortunate state of pecuniary affairs during the last year, the men engaged in making this road have been unable to comply with their contract. Because of the financial condition of the country, they have been unable to carry out what they promised to perform; but in this matter they are no more unfortunate than the Government of the United States, in whose behalf my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] speak; because the Government solemnly promised to pay $400,000,000 in gold coin, not one cent of which has been redeemed. The champions of the Government who ask for equity here should first do equity. While the Government of the United States is itself a defaulter because of the unfortunate state of pecuniary affairs during the last year, to which I have alluded, surely the Representatives of the Government here to-day will have a little forbearance toward this railroad, which has done all that could be done under the circumstances toward its completion. All that the company asks is an extension of time. Fifty miles of the road have been surveyed, and have been partly graded; and with the aid of this land grant the company can go into the market and borrow enough money to complete those fifty miles of road which are yet unfinished; and with that fifty miles of road completed they will have a market—they will have a connection between Lake Michigan and Lake Superior.

It will be not only an advantage to everybody along the road, but it will be of national advantage. This road runs through the heaviest timbered land of that State. It will bring the timber not only to the people of Wisconsin and to the people of Illinois, but to the people the gentleman from Indiana represents, and it will give them far cheaper timber than they can get now. I say it is not of local nor of sectional interest, but it is of national advantage; and I trust the Representatives of the people here, knowing the fact that these men have expended $6,000,000, that they have done their utmost, and that had it not been for the unfortunate financial crisis of September last they would have been in a fair way of completing the road in time—I say, in consideration of all these facts, I think it would not only be right and expedient, but simple justice, that we should extend this grant two years and a half to enable them to complete the road according to the conditions imposed by the law.

Mr. BRADLEY. I now yield to my colleague on the committee from Texas, [Mr. HERNDON.]

Mr. HERNDON. Mr. Speaker, this grant was made on the 5th day of May, 1864, to expire by its own limitation in ten years. The grant was made to the State of Wisconsin for certain railroads within that State. The State of Wisconsin, subsequent to the making of this grant, made sundry changes by chartering other roads and authorizing the consolidation of certain roads to which this grant was to inure. That action of the State of Wisconsin in regard to these roads was subsequently, in 1866, by joint resolution of Congress, recognized and approved. Up to this time not one mile of the road had been built nor had one acre of land been received. Under this joint resolution and under the authority of the original grant the State of Wisconsin made further legislation by which it authorized the further consolidation of certain roads which were to receive the benefits of this grant. On the 14th of June, 1869, these several roads, under the authority of that legislation, did consolidate and make one road. On the 5th day of November, 1869, these lands, for the first time, were withdrawn from market, and were withdrawn in order that these roads which were consolidated should receive the benefits of the grant. Thus, from the 5th day of May, 1864, to the 5th day of November, 1869, these lands had remained in the market and were taken up for homesteads or by other railroads which passed through that section. Virtually there was a period of five years of the limitation of ten years which Congress had recognized and the State of Wisconsin had recognized, and during all that time these railroads, which had been consolidated, had not received one acre nor had one mile of road been built.

Mr. HOLMAN. Were not these Boston men waiting until the lands had become more valuable, because of the industry of the settlers who had taken up homesteads?

Mr. HERNDON. I think not; I think they had nothing to do with it whatever. It was because of the legislation of Wisconsin and of the legislation of the Congress of the United States. When the grant was originally made for the four hundred and two miles of road the State of Wisconsin under that grant would have received two million two hundred thousand acres of land, but because of this legislation, and consequently because of the fact that the lands were not withdrawn from market until the 5th of November, 1869, a period of five years after the grant was made, a large portion of these lands were taken up by homesteads and in other ways.

Now these consolidated companies commenced their work in 1869, and on the 5th of November, as I have already stated, these lands were withdrawn from market. A period of only five years has elapsed since that period, and yet these consolidated companies have built two hundred miles of this road and built it in the most thorough manner. Thus they have actually had only five years, as recognized by the Congress of the United States and by the State of Wisconsin, in which to carry on this work, and they have already built one-half of the work in the most acceptable manner. Because they did not begin the work earlier than the 5th of November they will not be able to secure the whole of the two million two hundred thousand acres of land. They will hardly receive seven hundred and fifty thousand acres under this grant; and if we accord them this extension which they ask, until the 1st of December, 1876, still they will have but seven years in which to complete this work from the time they commenced, and which time was recognized both by the State of Wisconsin and by the Congress of the United States. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me no stronger case in equity can be presented than the claim on the part of these consolidated roads.

As to what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says about certain men of Boston, I know not and care not. I do not know any of these men, and I believe they have not had any influence upon the Committee on the Public Lands. As far as I understand, the Committee on the Public Lands were unanimous in their conclusion that this extension of time ought to be made, and with a distinct understanding, too, that it was no new land grant but that it was the most equitable case that could be put.

[Here the hammer fell]

Mr. CLYMER. Will my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BRADLEY,] yield to me one moment?

Mr. BRADLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLYMER. I beg leave to say in justice to myself, after what has fallen from my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HERNDON,] that he is in error in saying that the committee was unanimous. I think that it was admitted by all that if the time of any land grants should be extended, this case presented equities entitling it to such action. Therefore a large majority of the committee recommended the passage of a bill similar in nature to the Senate bill now under consideration. But, sir, speaking for myself, and I believe I speak for another member of the committee, [Mr. HEREFORD,] we reserved our right to vote against the bill on the ground that we were hostile to the original system of granting lands for railroad purposes, and we believed it to be the true policy of the Government, and in accordance with the general and almost unanimous will of the people, that the first and every opportunity should be embraced by Congress to bring to an end a system which has been so justly condemned.

Mr. BRADLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] five minutes.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not know that I need five minutes to say what I desire to say, and I will try not to repeat anything that has been said.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has taken back most of the remarks he made when he was shouting at the top of his voice that this was a grant of millions of acres. All that will be taken by the company, if this land grant is extended, will be three hundred and seventy-one thousand acres.

Now, what does the State of Wisconsin ask? For I say this is a request from the State of Wisconsin rather than from the company. What is the request? It is that, after having spent on the railroad $6,000,000, and having been embarrassed by unforeseen and untoward circumstances, so as to be unable to complete the road within the time limited by act of Congress, they shall have that time extended. The trouble with England, the great Chicago fire, the Boston fire, and, finally, the panic, all conspired to prevent the company from completing the road within the time fixed by act of Congress.

What is asked here by the State of Wisconsin and by this company is nothing more than might be asked by an individual in any court of equity in the land. It is a case which would entitle any individual or party to relief in any court of equity where equity is administered. It is simply a question of time—time which is never considered of the essence of a contract, unless it is so expressly stipulated in the bond or the contract. I say it is simply a question of time, which is not of the essentials of this contract between the United States and the State of Wisconsin—time which was not much considered, which was not a thing the United States had much in view, in limiting the time to ten years.

What was essential was good faith, was the building of the road, was the accomplishment of the purpose that was sought, and that alone. And has not the company exhibited good faith? Have they not done all that could be expected of them? And have they not made a case that would entitle them to relief in any court in this land?

This is all I have to say in regard to it. An application is made here which addresses itself to the justice and the equity of every member upon this floor. The case has an equity so strong and so great that no court of equity would refuse to grant that relief which is asked here from this Congress.

Mr. BRADLEY. I will now yield a few minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] and after he has addressed the House I will call the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield, nor do I think the people of the great West yield, to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] or the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] in their opposition to despoiling the General Government of its lands and conferring them unworthily on great corporations, whether railroad or otherwise.

It is nevertheless true that, when Government exercises any of its functions to confer a grant or privilege which in turn is corruptly and wickedly abused, there is always a disposition to fly to the opposite extreme, and abandon the use of the function rather than attempt to correct the abuse. Such disposition has manifested itself more than once during the present session of this Congress. We have not only passed through a financial panic, but we are legislating to some extent in a political panic. This was natural, was inevitable, from the condition of things; but, Mr. Speaker, it will not always be so. The time is coming, and I trust speedily, when all abuses of power or privilege conferred by the Government, no matter by whom or where committed, can be dealt with candidly yet fearlessly, and disposed of according to the immutable laws of justice and the eternal principles of truth.

But I cannot dwell upon generalities in a ten-minute speech. Now, sir, what is the plain justice of this case, and what are the facts as presented by the memorial of our Legislature and fortified by the report of the Committee on the Public Lands of this House? On the 5th of May, 1864, Congress granted, by an act duly approved, two million two hundred thousand acres of land for the construction of railroads in the State of Wisconsin. The general route was defined. The grant, having ten years to run, expires on the 5th day of May next. In 1866 the Legislature of Wisconsin chartered the Winnebago and Superior Railroad Company and the Portage and Superior Railroad Company, and conferred the benefit of this grant on the latter company.

Now, standing at Stevens Point, formerly the entrepot for the supplies of the pineries in Northern Wisconsin, and looking eastward to Lake Michigan, you find Lake Winnebago, a beautiful inland sheet of water, intervening about half-way.

Starting from Menasha, the initial point of the Winnebago road, at the northern end of this lake, and going about sixty-four miles westward, you come to Stevens Point. Now, looking southward toward Chicago, you find Portage City about seventy-two miles away. This is the initial point of the Portage line chartered by the Legislature in 1866, which thereby received this grant These two lines converge at Stevens Point and pass thence in a northwesterly direction through the dense forests of Northern Wisconsin to Ashland, on Lake Superior, one hundred and seventy miles away. On the 21st of June, 1866, Congress by joint resolution ratified this action of the State Legislature, and relocated the route. On the 21st of May, 1869, the Legislature of Wisconsin consolidated these two lines under the name of the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company, and authorized it to build the road to Ashland and Superior City, on Lake Superior.

Now, what did this company do? It entered upon the work early in the spring of 1869. It has completed two hundred miles of the road in four years. How did it do it? Did it follow in the track of land-grant roads generally? No, sir. It had not forgotten all the old maxims of honesty, though engaged in building a railroad. Before one shovelful of earth was moved these stockholders and capitalists of Boston put in $1,800,000 in hard cash as the capital stock of that company. Then by the issue and negotiations of bonds they raised more money, and have expended upon this line about $6,000,000 in all, and we have now two hundred and two miles of the road constructed.

Against what external obstacles did they contend? The report tells you. They negotiated in London a loan of $8,000,000. The Alabama troubles came; the papers were to be signed on a certain day; on that very day an editorial appeared in the London Times dwelling upon the disturbed relations between the United States and England, and that day the negotiation was broken off and canceled. They then negotiated a loan of $6,000,000 in Germany; $1,000,000 of it had actually been paid, but owing again to these same troubles, that negotiation was canceled, the loan being optional. Yet against all odds they pushed forward their work until they were struck by the Chicago fire, which burned their western office, and spread consternation and dismay over the whole Northwest, and stayed almost every business enterprise. Still this company pushed on into the wilderness until they were struck by the Boston fire, which affected vitally and deeply those business men and capitalists, for Boston was their home. By these two fires a gold loan of $1,000,000 in Germany and $2,000,000 in London were both defeated. Still they went on with their work. This, sir, is what I call old-time business pluck and honesty. Finally the panic of last year, like a financial simoom, struck them as it did the country and swept all before it. Then they were compelled to suspend work. These are the external obstacles which they had to encounter. What were the internal ones?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to ask the gentleman a question right at that point. I want to ask him as a lawyer whether, if this were a contract between two private parties on precisely the same terms, a court of equity would not relieve the party which failed to complete the railroad?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I know that question is put in the spirit of kindness, and I judge it must come from a friend of the bill. I can but regret that the eminent gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] did not occupy the floor for the purpose of answering his own question, for I feel sure that, with his ripe learning and fine judicial mind, he could tell us in fitter and far more forcible language than I can that no court under Heaven pretending to the common sentiments of justice or equity would ever think of allowing to be pleaded such a miserable pretense for estoppel as this short lapse of time caused by the misfortunes of this company.

But to return. What are the internal obstacles with which they have had to contend? Sir, go over this line west from Stevens Point, as I have done, see it as it pierces the wilderness for one hundred and seventeen miles through a forest so dense that the light at the end of the avenue seems almost like the light at the end of a great tunnel through a mountain. Here are trees two, three, and four feet in diameter, pine, oak, ash, hickory, beech, and maple, standing on one of the most arable soils in the world, and a district of country capable of being one of the richest sections in our State or in any other; but imagine the grubbing, grading, and excavating required through such a section as this. Have they built their road with what a manager of a rolling-mill once told me was "land-grant iron?" I asked him what that was. He replied that it was "anything that would reach."

No, sir; instead of using that they have put in iron that weighs fifty-seven pounds to the yard—fifty or fifty-two pounds being all that necessity required.

What kind of bridges have they built? When the line reached White River they might easily have cut down the pine, oak, and hemlock, brought in their portable mills, cut out their dimension-timbers, piked them into the form of a trellis, bolted them together, and sent their cars whirling over that. What if the timbers were green and unseasoned, did any construction company in the United States, especially in the West, ever pause on that account? But what did they do? Sir, they put up one of the most magnificent and durable iron bridges, I venture to say, on this continent, set in solid masonry, sixteen hundred feet in span, and ninety feet above the river. Go to the next considerable stream and there you find another iron bridge. All along the road you find Tyler's patent switches, over which the fastest lightning-express train can pass free of danger. My ten minutes only give me time to add that go along this road and you will find twenty-eight hundred and twelve ties to the mile when only twenty-six hundred are required; the road-bed is nine feet in width, when only seven feet were required. The road is finely ballasted throughout; a thing unusual on a new line.

And what does all this mean? Figure it up and you will find that they might have saved $20,000 on the ties. They bought American iron when they might have purchased English iron far cheaper. They did it because American iron was the best, and they wanted the best. They might have saved $400,000 on that single item. They might have saved $350,000 in grading and ballasting this road; for, as I have said, it is ballasted the whole length, which, as I understand, is not required under the grant. They might have saved on other items in the prosecution of this work nearly half a million dollars and still secured the grant.

Look at the other troubles they had to encounter. If they could keep their supply depot at the end of the line all they had to do was to run out over the road the materials for supplies and construction. They could extend the graveling five miles in advance and construct their road with economy. But, sir, they had but four years to do it all. What did they do? Go out into that country to-day and you will see where they took a circuit of twenty or thirty or even fifty miles around to the then settlements away from the road. Here they cut through the forests for fifty or a hundred miles, corduroyed the marshes, sent in their supplies on pack-mules, and finally in small loads on wagons, and in that way by great perseverance they got their supplies in for the construction of this road.

They have prosecuted the work until the road has reached one of the richest deposits of iron ore on the continent; iron which in its tensile qualities is far superior to any other in this country or England. This road, stretching through the interior of the State, and on to Milwaukee and Chicago, will bring out these ores, which are used in the rolling-mills of these two cities, at Cleveland, and, I understand, in Ohio and Pennsylvania. They have but fifty miles more to build to complete one through line to Milwaukee; and then, with the road built to Portage City, another great trunk line will run almost continuous to Chicago on the left and Saint Louis on the right, thus opening up an avenue to these great rival cities right from the forests and mines of Northern Wisconsin and Lake Superior. I have omitted to say, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] that these lands were covered by agricultural scrip, and subject to selection and purchase until November, 1869, and this company can now get no more than seven hundred thousand acres, one-third of the original amount.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I ask for but five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. When this company found these obstacles standing in their path did they stop pay? Were there any soldiers ranged along the line with bayonets to keep laboring men quiet when they clamored for the pay which they had earned by their sweat and toil, as there was in Pennsylvania the other day; and which, whatever the necessity, may well cause legislators and statesmen to pause and ponder? No, sir; these men were paid promptly and faithfully, and when the panic struck them last year, and there was no longer any hope, I understand that some of these capitalists mortgaged their own private fortunes, and brought fifteen hundred men out of the woods, paid them their wages, and sent them to their homes in the large cities, or out on the prairies, many of them with their families to suffer want. The snow fell and covered the track and graded lines, the forest was silent, and railroad building in Northern Wisconsin ceased for the winter.

Now will this House set its seal of condemnation upon such conduct as this, upon such honorable dealing, such maxims of business honesty, which we are all trying to bring railroad-men back to? Will we condemn it now because somebody heretofore has cheated the Government? Sir, my ancestry were from New England; and while I remember it with veneration, and while I respect the refinement, the culture, the thrift, and the genius of that section, I confess there is a little of the "finer-clay" feeling pertaining to Boston and its surroundings which I do not positively long for; yet I do respect the clean, pure blood of Boston and New England. True, Mr. Speaker, I do sometimes almost wish that they had just a little more of the geniality of the West injected into their veins. I believe when they became used to it they would be all the more comfortable for it, and I know it would not hurt them. But there is something which the generous West needs quite as much, and that is the careful economy, the substantial thrift, and the faithful performance of the Yankee of the East. They have come to us in our forests, and by the investment of their energy, labor, and capital there they have undertaken to give us what we so much need for our example, prosperity, and advancement. Will this House now rebuke them for it? I hope, in the name of reason and common justice, it will do no such thing, but will pass this bill.

Mr. BRADLEY. I ask that the report of the committee, containing the information upon which they formed their conclusions, be printed at length in the RECORD.

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, having had under consideration the bill (S. No. 512) to extend the time for constructing the Wisconsin Central Railroad, in Wisconsin, beg leave to make the following report:

In 1864 Congress granted lands to aid in building certain railroads in Wisconsin, by act approved May 5, 1864; said grant was ten sections on each side of said railroads, and to expire in ten years on May 5, 1874. (Statutes at Large No. 33, pages 66, 67, 68.)

By a joint resolution approved June 21, 1866, Congress amended the original act respecting the route over which the roads were to be constructed, and recognized the action of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin in conferring a portion of said grant on the Portage and Superior Railroad Company. (Statutes at Large No. 14, pages 360, 361.)

Wisconsin, in 1866, chartered the Winnebago and Superior Railroad Company and the Portage and Superior Railroad Company, and conferred on said roads the benefits of said grants.

These roads were consolidated by said State of Wisconsin, June 14, 1869, as the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company.

The lands granted were not withdrawn from settlement or sale until November, 1869, by reason of inability of the original companies to benefit thereby, and settlements and sales were made of a large portion of the lands, and those also the most valuable.

There will be about seven hundred and fifty thousand acres, all told, which the present company can acquire after building its four hundred and two miles of road, while the grant contemplates twenty-two hundred thousand acres. (Executive Document No. 43 second session Forty-second Congress.)

The Wisconsin Central Railroad entered on their enterprise early in the year 1869. It has constructed and equipped two hundred miles of road. It has been completed in a superior manner, expended $1,800,000 of subscribed funds, and upward of $4,000,000 derived from the sale of or pledge of bonds.

The stockholders, whose petition is herewith attached and made a part of this report, marked A, contemplate furnishing fifty miles of road, which will close up a gap and give them a continuous line to the lake; thence eighty miles to Superior City. They also propose to build the line from Portage City to Stevens Point, seventy-two miles, making the total of four hundred and two miles.

The stockholders, during a period of very great difficulties, have furnished, equipped, and are now operating two hundred miles of railroad from November, 1869, and it is reasonable to think they will complete the two hundred and two miles within the time asked for. The stockholders are gentlemen of known character for wealth and enterprise.

From the facts placed before the committee, we are satisfied that the railroad company have labored hard to complete its road within the time prescribed by the act making the grant; and from the amount of money long since invested in the project, it would appear to have been for the company's interest to complete its lines of road at the earliest period practicable, so that the money invested might be earning something, as well as to avoid the necessity of coming before Congress asking for an extension of time. We see nothing to indicate that the company have been or that it would be their interest to be dilatory, but that the reasons were, as they claim, from great public calamities and beyond their control. They ask for no new grant of lands, but simply for an extension of the time for about two and a half years. The facts show that they have struggled hard and in good faith to complete their road, which will protect the many settlers who with their families have located along its line in the wilderness, with the full expectation and belief that the same would be completed at no distant day, thereby affording them communication with the outside world, and which will materially aid in the development of this part of the country. This extension, if granted, will enable the company to complete its lines of road and thereby fulfill all of its obligations and protect amply those parties who have furnished them money, and are willing to furnish more, depending largely upon the security these lands afford. The case seems to be one full of merits, and calls for special consideration in its favor. The committee are of the opinion that were the case pending between individuals, custom would demand that the time asked for be granted, and a refusal characterized as severe and unfeeling. The Legislature of Wisconsin have memorialized Congress to extend the time, and represent the building of the road to be of great national and State importance, and earnestly prays for a favorable action by Congress. The railroad company claim that by reason of the already enhanced price of the remaining sections of land the United States has or will receive full value for lands this company will receive. The committee beg leave to submit, as a further statement of the case, the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, marked B.

In view of the merits of the case, the committee ask leave to report the bill to the House, and recommend that the same do pass.

Mr. BRADLEY. I now call for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the previous question shall not be seconded, will it be in order to move to recommit this bill, with instructions to limit the price and quantity of the lands to be sold to actual settlers?

The SPEAKER. It will.

The previous question was then seconded, upon a division—ayes 102, noes not counted.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the main question to be now put.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays, for I desire to have an opportunity to move to recommit this bill with instructions to the committee to limit the amount to be sold to any one person to one hundred and sixty acres, and to fix the price to be taken by the company for this land.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being 37 in the affirmative, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 133, nays 79, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bradley, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Clayton, Clinton L. So the main question was ordered.

During the roll-call,

Mr. STORM said: On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. HERSEY, who if here would vote in the affirmative, while I should vote in the negative.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and accordingly read the third time.

The question being upon the passage of the bill,

Mr. O'BRIEN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; there being ayes 23, noes not counted.

The bill was passed.

Mr. BRADLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSIDERATION OF REFERENCES.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the various votes by which bills, resolutions, &c., were to-day referred or recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2186) granting an American registry to the American-built Peruvian steamship Rayo, now rebuilt in the United States and converted into a sailing-vessel.

CONTAGIOUS AND INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

Mr. BROMBERG. I move to suspend the rules so that the Committee of the Whole may be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1584) to prevent the importation of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States, and that the bill be brought before the House for consideration at this time.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment on a motion to suspend the rules which will take no time?

Mr. BROMBERG. I cannot yield.

Mr. COX. I call for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Surgeon-General of the Army, the Surgeon-General of the Navy, and the supervising surgeon of marine hospitals of the Treasury Department be, and are hereby, constituted, ex officio, a national board of health.

SEC. 2. That said board shall have power to establish and enforce such rules and regulations as it shall deem necessary to prevent the importation into the United States of infectious or contagious diseases.

SEC. 3. That within thirty days after the passage of this act the members of the board shall meet and organize, and shall draw up a system of quarantine regulations, and of regulations to prevent the importation of infectious or contagious diseases into the United States, which shall be approved by the President, and when approved shall have the force and effect of law until modified or repealed by said board, subject to the approval of the President. The same shall be laid before the Congress at its annual meeting.

SEC. 4. That there shall be detailed or assigned by the President, from among the commissioned medical officers of either the Army or the Navy, or from among the surgeons of the marine-hospital service of the Treasury Department, to be selected without regard to rank, but solely with reference to skill and experience in hygiene and sanitary science, one who shall be the secretary to the above national board of health. And said secretary shall, in addition, under the direction of the board, be charged with the execution and enforcement of the regulations of said board, and with the supervision of all matters pertaining to the maintenance and establishment of the system of quarantine prescribed by the board.

SEC. 5. That for the execution of the duties arising out of this act any medical officer of the Army or the Navy, or any surgeon of the marine-hospital service of the Treasury Department, may be detailed or assigned, according to the exigencies of the service, with especial regard to economy and efficiency.

SEC. 6. That no person in the employment of the Government, detailed or assigned to duty under the provisions of this act, shall receive any additional compensation therefor, but shall be allowed the same mileage as is now by law authorized to officers of the Army and Navy whenever traveling under orders in connection with duties arising under the provisions of this act, which shall be paid by the Department or branch of the service to which the person entitled to mileage may belong. The board may, however, employ temporarily citizen clerks for strictly clerical duties.

SEC. 7. That the President of the United States shall issue such instructions to the officers of the various Departments of the Government, not interfering with their peculiar duties, as shall secure to the board of health the aid and co-operation necessary to perfecting and enforcing its sanitary regulations.

SEC. 8. That any person willfully violating the rules and regulations prescribed by the board of health, and approved by the President, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $500, or to imprisonment for not more than two years, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 9. That the provisions of this act shall not be so construed as to prevent the establishment and maintenance, by States or municipalities, of health regulations and quarantine measures, in addition to or furtherance of the system prescribed by the national board; and such local system and its appendages shall remain under the control of the respective local authorities; but any local law or regulation interfering with or obstructing the due execution of the national system shall be null and void.

SEC. 10. That the circuit courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of all cases arising under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 11. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes 73, noes 36; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BROMBERG and Mr. COX were appointed.

Mr. BROMBERG. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will not insist on his opposition to this bill.

Mr. COX. The gentleman need not ask me to withdraw objection to a bill that makes——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not appoint tellers for the purpose of debate.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 115, noes 42.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question recurring on agreeing to the motion,

Mr. COX called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to call for the reading of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It has been read.

Mr. RANDALL. I know that; but there has been intervening business. I do not understand the scope of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It would require unanimous consent to have the bill read again.

Several members objected.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being—ayes 21, noes 87.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 125, nays 77, not voting 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Bell, Bowen, Bradley, Bright Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Burleigh, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, John B. Clark, jr., Clayton, Clinton L. NAYS—Messrs. Schumaker, Sessions, Sherwood, Southard, Speer, Storm, Swann, Townsend, Tremain, Waldron, Wallace, Marcus L. Ward, Whitehouse, Charles W. Willard, Wood, Woodford, and John D. Young—77.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Averill, Banning, Barnum, Barry, Bundy, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Cotton, Creamer, Crocker, Crooke, Darrall, Dawes, DeWitt, Duell, Eldredge, Field, Foster, Glover, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Harmer, Havens, Joseph R. Hawley, Hersey, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hynes, Jewett, Kelley, Kellogg, Killinger, Lamport, Lansing, Lewis, Lowe, Maynard, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Mitchell, Moore, Morrison, Negley, Nesmith, Potter, Pratt, Randall, Ransier, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Henry B. Sayler, Henry J. Scudder, Sheats, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Sloss, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, Starkweather, Stephens, Stowell, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Tyner, Waddell, White, Whitehead, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, and Pierce M. B. Young—88.

So the rules were not suspended, (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative,) and the bill was not taken up for consideration.

FITZHUGH LEE.

Mr. SENER. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of passing a bill (H. R. No. 2866) relieving the legal and political disabilities of Fitzhugh Lee.

The bill, which was read, provides, two-thirds of the House concurring therein, that the legal and political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States on Fitzhugh Lee, of Virginia, be, and are thereby, removed.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should like to hear what reason there is for passing bills of this character. We have already passed a general bill, including Fitzhugh Lee with all others, which bill has gone to the Senate.

Mr. SENER. But the Senate seems unwilling to pass that bill. The session is rapidly wearing away, and there surely can be no reason why, after this House by more than a two-thirds vote, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] has decided that all political and legal disabilities should be removed from all parties in the United States who are laboring under them—I say I can see no reason why political and legal disabilities should be allowed to remain upon General Fitzhugh Lee more than upon any other man. He has faithfully complied with all the requirements of the Constitution and laws, and is to day as good and as law-abiding a citizen as there is within the limits of the State of Virginia.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman to recollect what Dr. Franklin was told by his father about saying grace over a barrel of pork. We took that advice at the beginning of the session, and said grace in a lump. It is hardly necessary, therefore, we should now go over the whole work by piecemeal.

Mr. SENER. It appears that the Senate do not want to say grace in a lump, and as they propose to peddle it out, I am therefore compelled to introduce this bill for the relief of General Fitzhugh Lee.

The rules were suspended, (more than two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill was passed.

FANNIE LEHR.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I move to suspend the rules so that the Committee on Commerce shall be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2124) authorizing the changing of the name of the steamer Fannie Lehr, and that it be passed.

The bill was read. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is thereby, authorized and directed to allow the owners of the merchant steamer Fannie Lehr, a vessel of American ownership and register, to change her name, and be hereafter known as the Cockade City.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof,) and the bill was passed.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of passing the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, Pending the bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriation bills for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes, in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it shall be in order to offer for consideration an amendment providing that any violation of the provisions of section 7 of the act of July 12, 1870, by any officer of the Government, shall be deemed a misdemeanor and punishable in the manner provided for in section 3 of the act of July 25, 1868.

Mr. SPEER. What is section 7?

Mr. WHEELER. It provides that no officer of the Government shall expend, or contract to expend, beyond what is appropriated by Congress.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the resolution was adopted.

AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BECK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That it shall be in order to move as an amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill to strike out of the sixth section of the act of July 6, 1870, being an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1871," these words: "without being drawn against in settlement of accounts."

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. COBURN. I think there should be some explanation. I object to this mode of drawing resolutions, the picking out the section by number and merely citing words without the context.

Mr. BECK. This applies to the case where appropriations have been passed more than two years ago and the Treasury is now drawing them out. The resolution is to make the amendment in order.

The resolution was agreed to.

OFFICERS UNDER IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to have a day fixed for the consideration of the bill which I desire to report from the Committee on the Judiciary, to prevent maladministration in the civil service of the United States by its officers against whom articles of impeachment have been presented.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first recognize some gentlemen who have requests to make to which they believe there will be no objection.

EXPENSES OF INDIAN COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2867) to authorize the use of certain unexpended balances in the United States Treasury; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to use for the payment of the expenses of the board of Indian commissioners for the year ending June 30, 1874, the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for said purposes by the act of May 29, 1872, said unexpended balance being $8,061.71.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

FORT KEARNEY MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. ORR. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Public Lands, for present consideration, the bill (S. No. 241) to confirm the title to certain lands on the Fort Kearney military reservation, in Fremont County, Iowa.

The bill in its preamble sets forth certain described entries at the Council Bluffs land district, in the State of Iowa, made on lands which had been reserved for military purposes for the use of Fort Kearney, by order of the President of the United States, dated the 9th of April, 1846, and therefore illegal; and further recites that the Secretary of War, by letter under date of the 11th of March, 1870, advised the Secretary of the Interior "that the United States military reservation at Fort Kearney, on the Missouri River, is no longer required for military purposes;" and that the register and the receiver at Council Bluffs, Iowa, have reported, under date of May 23, 1870, to the General Land Office that due notice having been given to all persons having any interest in the same to appear before them on the 18th day of May, 1870, and show cause why the above-named entries should not be confirmed by act of Congress, no adverse claimants appeared before them; the bill therefore proposes to confirm the said described entries and selections, and authorizes patents to issue for the same as in other cases provided for by law.

Mr. MAYNARD. Such a bill should not go through under a suspension of the rules unless we have an assurance that it has been examined by the committee and has the sanction of their report.

Mr. ORR. It has been examined by the Committee on the Public Lands. This bill has passed the Senate, and a bill exactly similar to it in its words is now on the Calendar, having been passed by the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman state what is the object of the bill?

Mr. ORR. The military reservation of Fort Kearney was abandoned as a military post twenty years or more ago. Supposing that it was public land, and that the military reservation could be sold as public land, the land officers at Council Bluffs, Iowa, sold the lands, or ordered them into market, and they were sold and bought up by purchasers. It was afterwards ascertained that the sale was illegal, for the reason that Congress had never relinquished its claim to this military reservation, and that the ordering it for sale was illegal. These lands are occupied by settlers, and nobody has any adverse claim. I hold in my hand a letter of the Secretary of War and a letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who both concur in approving this bill.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the object of this bill is to quiet the titles of honest bona fide purchasers who paid their money?

Mr. ORR. It is.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does it conflict with any outstanding claim?

Mr. ORR. It does not.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask to have the papers read which have been referred to by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. ORR. I send to the desk to be read the letter of the Secretary of War.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT.
Washington City, March 11, 1870.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you, in reply to an inquiry under date of the 7th instant received from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that the United States military reservation at Fort Kearney, on the Missouri River, is no longer required for military purposes, and a suitable recommendation for its relinquishment to the custody and control of the Department of the Interior will be made to Congress.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

The honorable SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. ORR. I now send to the desk to be read the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 15, 1872.

SIR: In compliance with your request, made in person this morning, I have the honor to state that there appears to be no adverse claims to the lands described in H. R. bill No. 2196, which lands were embraced within the late Fort Kearney reservation.

These tracts were entered many years ago by the parties named in the bill, and being within said reservation they were illegal. There are very many persons who have an interest therein which has been derived from or under conveyances extending back to the original purchasers.

The War Department has relinquished all claim to said lands and the report of the register and receiver at Council Bluffs, Iowa, shows that an investigation was duly had, and that there were no adverse claimants to any of said lands.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

WILLIS DRUMMOND,
Commissioner.

Hon. P. W. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman who represents the district is prepared to state from his personal knowledge that this bill is correct, I would pay more regard to that than to the representations of officials.

Mr. McDILL, of Iowa. In response to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] I will say that this land is situated in my district. The bill is simply a proposition to confirm the title to actual settlers, the original purchasers of the land. They have lived there on that land for more than twenty years. There is a flourishing little village on this land. They have bought the land in good faith and have paid for it; and there is only this technical defect in the way of completing their titles.

Mr. MAYNARD. Are there no adverse claims?

Mr. McDILL, of Iowa. There are no adverse claims. I think the amount of land altogether is about three hundred acres. It is situated immediately opposite the Nebraska line.

Mr. CROUNSE. As the gentleman has just stated, this land is situated immediately opposite my State, and I am satisfied that there is nothing in this bill but what is correct.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

BOUNTY FOR COLORED SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Appropriations, for consideration at this time, a bill to render available an unexpended balance of appropriation for collection and payment for bounty, &c., for colored soldiers and sailors.

The bill was read. It provides that the balance of the appropriation, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the collection and payment of bounty, prize-money, and other legitimate claims of colored soldiers and sailors, unexpended at the expiration of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, may be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War for the payment of expenses incurred in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, in the collection and payment of bounty, prize-money, and other legitimate claims of colored soldiers and sailors.

Mr. SPEER. Is that legislation needed only in reference to colored soldiers?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not legislation at all. The business of the Freedmen's Bureau was transferred to the War Department and with it the appropriations that had already been made to pay bounty and back pay due to colored soldiers. The appropriation for this year was entirely run out on the 1st of April, but the balance remaining over from last year, if made available for this year, will carry them through to the 1st of July next, and this bill simply makes available the balance of last year remaining over.

We have been very strongly urged by gentlemen from several States to ask the passage of this bill in advance of the regular deficiency bill, in order that these persons may be paid. The following letters from the Secretary of War explain the matter:

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 16, 1874.

The Secretary of War has the honor to inclose herewith, for the information of the United States Senate, a copy of a letter, dated the 9th instant, from the Adjutant-General of the Army, relative to the insufficiency of the unexpended balance of appropriation for collection and payment of bounties, &c., to colored soldiers and sailors, for current fiscal year, and recommending that if the deficiency appropriation ($35,000) asked for cannot be obtained, the estimate therefor be withdrawn, and that Congress render available the unexpended balance of appropriation made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873.

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 9, 1874.

GENERAL: Of the appropriation, $50,000, for the freedmen's branch of your office, but about $22,000 remain to conduct the business until June 30 next.

The estimated expenses per month are, at the lowest limit, $5,500; therefore, at the end of April the entire appropriation will have been expended, and unless some provision is made, all work will have to stop and the clerks be discharged.

On the 4th day of September, 1873, you submitted to the Secretary of War an estimate for $35,000 to supply deficiencies for the current fiscal year. Should this estimate be accepted by Congress and the amount appropriated, no difficulty will be experienced in conducting the work of the office. In view, however, of the present financial difficulties, and the evident intention of Congress to reduce expenditures, &c., it is, in my opinion, extremely doubtful whether the appropriation asked for can be obtained, and I would therefore suggest that said estimate be withdrawn, and that Congress be asked to render available the unexpended balance ($41,549.94) of appropriation for collection and payment of bounty, &c., for the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1873.

I submit herewith the draught of a joint resolution covering the matter.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS M. VINCENT,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL U. S. Army.

MEM.—The estimate, duly made, for the year ending June 30, 1874, was for $100,000. It was reduced to $50,000, without consultation with the War Department.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
January 10, 1874.

Respectfully submitted to the Secretary of War and strongly recommended, unless the deficiency appropriation asked for can be obtained. It is highly necessary that these claims should be settled as soon as possible, as every day vastly increases the difficulty of obtaining evidence to discriminate between good and fraudulent claims. It would be a miserable economy to discharge the experienced and reliable clerks now on the work, and to renew it after some months with new ones.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, February 6, 1874.

SIR: Referring to my communication of the 16th ultimo, relative to the insufficiency of the unexpended balance of appropriation for collection and payment of bounties, &c., to colored soldiers and sailors, (see Senate Executive Document 20, Forty-third Congress, first session, copy inclosed,) I beg to again invite attention to the subject by inclosing a copy of the communication of January 9 from the Adjutant-General and to say that already is the work in question greatly obstructed in consequence of the want of funds.

The settlement of certificates received from the Auditor for the past month have doubled in number, and unless relief can be soon afforded the payments to claimants, which it was expected to average at least $80,000 per month, will necessarily be reduced, thus giving rise to clamor and complaint.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, the Adjutant-General, it will be remembered, transferred the late Bureau, re-established its business, paid 2,271 claims amounting to $424,228.28, and prepared 3,277 other claims amounting to $559,973.32 for payment; all this at an expense of $58,450.06; thus leaving an unexpended balance to be carried to the surplus fund of $41,549.94.

There is thus a most favorable showing in favor of the business under the present management; and if the necessary appropriations are granted, $400,000 at least of claims can be met between this time and the end of the present fiscal year.

If the appropriation be not granted, the business will be paralyzed, and by the end of April, if not sooner, entirely suspended, a result which would prove most disadvantageous to the public interest and one that would be much regretted.

I will be pleased if some one member, or members, of your committee will visit the freedmen's branch of the Adjutant-General's Office in order, if necessary, to a more complete understanding of the subject.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Hon. J. A. GARFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

I presume there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 2868) received its several readings, and was passed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. SPEER. Is that motion in order in reference to a bill which is passed under a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The bill was not passed under a suspension of the rules, but by unanimous consent. There is already a motion pending to suspend the rules, and what goes on while that motion is pending is by unanimous consent.

The motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

FORT STEILACOOM RESERVATION.

Mr. ORR. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Public Lands the bill (S. No. 254) to donate the military reservation at Fort Steilacoom to the Territory of Washington for the use of an insane asylum.

The bill was read for information. It proposes to donate section 33 of township numbered 20 north of range numbered 2 east, of Willamette meridian, embracing a portion of Fort Steilacoom military reservation and the military barracks thereon, in the county of Pierce, Territory of Washington, to that Territory, for the use and purpose of an asylum for the insane of the Territory, and for no other purpose; but the act is not to be construed or have the effect to impair any rights of any person in or to any portion of the lands acquired under any of the land laws of the United States.

Mr. SPEER. Is that the unanimous report of the Committee on the Public Lands?

Mr. ORR. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPEER. How much land does it donate?

Mr. ORR. The gentleman from Washington Territory can answer that question.

Mr. McFADDEN. The bill proposes to donate six hundred and forty acres of land; but one hundred and sixty acres of the six hundred and forty acres are covered by adverse claims, which would leave but four hundred and eighty acres. It is barren, gravelly land.

I will state for the information of the House that during the Forty-second Congress a bill for this purpose passed both branches of Congress, but failed to receive the signature of the President for want of time. This bill has already passed the Senate, and is reported favorably by the Committee on the Public Lands of the House.

Mr. SPEER. Does the bill affect the titles of adverse claimants?

Mr. McFADDEN. It does not; it protects them.

There being no objection, the report was received and the bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ELECTION CONTEST—BURNS VS. YOUNG.

Mr. CROSSLAND. I present a unanimous report of the Committee on Elections in the contested-election case of Burns vs. Young, from the tenth district of Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution accompanying the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John D. Young, the sitting member, was duly elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the tenth congressional district of Kentucky, and is entitled to his seat.

Mr. CROSSLAND. I ask that the report be laid upon the table and printed, and I give notice that I will call it up for consideration at an early day.

The report was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

Mr. McCORMICK. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, requested to furnish the House a list of all claims for losses through depredations committed by Indians presented to the Department of the Interior for ten years past, giving in each case the date, when and the place where the depredations were committed, the date of presentation of the claim, the name of the claimant or claimants, and the full amount of the claim; also the name of the tribe or band of Indians charged with depredations, and the action of the Department upon each claim.

Mr. DUNNELL. If that resolution is received, I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. McCORMICK. It simply asks for a list of claims.

Mr. SHANKS. I want to amend it so as to inquire as to the damages done by whites to the Indians.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have no objection to an amendment to that effect.

Mr. SHANKS. Very well; then I will not object to the resolution.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Let it go to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DUNNELL. I have no objection to that; but I should object to its adoption.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SEEDS, ETC., IN THE MAILS.

Mr. HAYS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following for action at this time:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That all seeds, cuttings, and plants sent by the Commissioner of Agriculture to any person or persons in the United States shall be transported through the mails free.

Mr. MAYNARD. That ought to be a joint resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it go to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. HAYS. I move to suspend the rules and pass it.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] holds the floor on a similar motion.

STREET-CARS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for action at this time:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and the same is hereby, instructed to report with as little delay as practicable a bill amendatory of the several acts of incorporation under which street-cars are run and operated in the District of Columbia, so as to define what shall be a legal day's work for conductors and drivers, and reducing the same from sixteen hours, as now prescribed by the several companies, to a reasonable standard, and protecting such parties against a reduction of their wages below existing rates.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let that be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary without being adopted.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object.

CAPITATION TAX ON IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. SPEER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the dimensions of foreign immigration to the United States have made it a measure of national importance and concern, and the bulk of such immigration passes through the port of New York, where by the operation of local laws it is made subject to a capitation tax ostensibly levied for the protection of the people of the State from the influx of foreign population, and to the more effectual guarding of the immigrants themselves; and whereas such capitation taxes coming, as they do, from the pockets of the immigrants, are regarded with suspicion and dislike by a large part of the country and by the commercial and business interests as oppressive to the immigrant and tending directly to check immigration, and should, if imposed at all, be imposed by Congress for the benefit of the whole country, and not of a single State; and whereas the present board of commissioners of immigration of New York is seeking to increase the capitation tax from one dollar and fifty cents to two dollars, although such increase is opposed by leading interests in that city, and the said board accused of culpable mismanagement and gross extravagance in the matter of salaries: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to investigate the manner in which the State of New York provides for the immigrant and disburses the amount collected for capitation taxes, in rendering assistance restricted by State laws to the limit of the State, and that said committee be empowered to send for persons and papers, and be required to report without delay.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. Let that resolution go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SPEER. It is simply a direction to the Committee on Commerce for investigation in behalf of immigrants.

Mr. BROMBERG. I ask the gentleman to accept an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House, objection being made to its adoption by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS,] who suggests that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SPEER. Very well; let it go to this committee, and I trust they will do their duty.

The resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

SUSPENSION OF OFFICERS IMPEACHED.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now insist upon my motion that the bill which I have sent to the Clerk's desk, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to prevent maladministration in the civil service of the United States by its officers against whom articles of impeachment have been presented, be set down for consideration and made the special order on Tuesday of next week at half-past one o'clock, not to antagonize the currency bill or the appropriation bills.

Mr. SHELDON. I believe there is a bill already set down for that day.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then this will come in after that. What bill is it?

Mr. SHELDON. For the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then I will say Wednesday of next week. I will get out of the mouth of the Mississippi.

Mr. CLYMER. Does that motion except other special orders ahead of that? I have one.

The SPEAKER. It could not interfere with the other special orders.

Mr. SHELDON. I was mistaken about the day when the Mississippi bill was made the special order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then I will renew my motion for a week from next Tuesday.

The question was taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 79, noes 21; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. MOREY were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 127, noes not counted.

So the motion was seconded.

The rules were then suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill (H. R. No. 2869) was made a special order for Tuesday, April 14, at half-past one p. m., the currency bill and the appropriation bills excepted.

INDIANS IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. O'BRIEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2887) to authorize nations and tribes of Indians in their corporate capacity, and individual members and citizens thereof, to sue and be sued in the courts of the United States of America; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

REORGANIZATION OF THE LAND OFFICE.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am instructed by the Committee on the Public Lands to move that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 760, to reorganize the clerical force of the General Land Office, and that it be made the special order for the 22d instant at half-past one.

Mr. GARFIELD. I must object to any more special orders.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will except appropriation bills.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it proposed to increase or diminish the force of the Land Office?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. This is a very important bill, and should be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must insist on my motion to adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose I have indicated, excepting the currency and the appropriation bills and previous special orders.

The SPEAKER. There is no necessity for excepting previous special orders.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill proposes an increase of officers. I must insist on my motion to adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentleman agreed to withdraw his motion for me.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman insists upon it I will do so.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do insist upon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then, as I promised to do so, I will withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who has made a motion to adjourn, yields to the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] who moves that the rules be so far suspended that the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reorganize the clerical force of the General Land Office may be taken from the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole and made a special order for the 22d day of this month at half-past one o'clock p. m.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. What increase will this bill make in the expense of the Land Office?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It will enlarge the clerical force by the addition of about five clerks, and will perchance increase the expense of the office some $30,000. But the reasons for it will, I think, be sufficient to satisfy the House when I can have the opportunity to explain them. All I ask now is that the bill be made a special order.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes 52, noes 51; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] insist on a further count?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir; I call for tellers.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adjourn. It is evident that my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] cannot get two-thirds in favor of his motion.

REVOLUTIONARY EXPENSES OF GEORGIA.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2469) to refund to the State of Georgia certain money expended by said State for the common defense in 1777; and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

REORGANIZATION OF CIRCUIT COURTS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2871) to reorganize the circuit courts of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

DEBATE ON THE CURRENCY BILL.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] yields to me to say that I am instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to endeavor to close the debate on the currency bill by calling the previous question at the end of the day's discussion to-morrow. And I suggest that after the gentleman now entitled to the floor shall have concluded his speech the debate be continued in speeches of twenty minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I am entitled to half an hour, as I understand. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether he means to call the previous question on the bill as a whole as reported by the committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have no instructions on that point.

JOANNA W. TURNER.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2872) granting a pension to Joanna W. Turner, widow of William D. Turner, late surgeon of the Ninety-seventh Illinois Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BECK. I call for the regular order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. RANDALL that the House adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The following bills were read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

The bill (H. R. No. 2549) to amend the act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," passed February 18, 1793; and

The bill (H. R. No. 420) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to discharge certain obligations of the United States to the creditors of the Upper and Lower bands of Sioux Indians was read twice by its title.

Mr. RAMSEY. That bill is the same as one reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs of this body, and I understand it is the desire of the chairman of that committee to ask for its consideration without a reference.

Mr. HAMLIN. That may be taken up after we have done morning business. Let us get through with the morning business.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then let that bill lie on the table for the present.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in pursuance of the eighth section of the act approved 22d July, 1854, the report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on the land grant to Juan de Mestas, being private land claim reported as No. 80 for land in Sante Fé County, New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of the report of the board of engineers appointed to examine and report upon the James River and Kanawha Canal project; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

ROBERT BENT AND JACK SMITH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 204) for the relief of Robert Bent and Jack Smith.

The amendments of the House of Representatives were to insert after the word "each" the words "recommended to be;" after the word "persons" the word "or;" strike out the words "assigns or legal representatives," and add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be construed or have the effect to interfere with or impair any rights of any persons to said lands which may have already been acquired under the homestead or pre-emption laws of the United States.

Mr. BOGY. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of S. A. Harris and others, citizens of Milwaukee, remonstrating against restoring the tax on tea and coffee or reviving or increasing internal taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of relief from the General Government to certain homestead settlers on railroad land whose homestead certificates have been canceled by the United States because of conflict with the land grant of the Grand Rapids and Indiana Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented the petition of Hannah, Lay & Co. and 158 other dealers of Michigan, praying for the conversion of the present ad valorem duty on tin plates into a corresponding and equivalent specific duty as a measure calculated to simplify and increase the collection of the customs revenue, facilitate the transaction of business, give stability to prices, and at once and forever render disagreements between the importer and the Government a practical impossibility; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Edmund Harris and others, residents of Wyandotte County, Kansas, praying that the law of March 3, 1873, granting bounty under the act of July 22, 1861, to colored soldiers returned on the muster-rolls as slaves, may be so amended as to grant bounty to widows, parents, children, or brothers and sisters of deceased soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCOTT. I present a petition of business men of Philadelphia, praying that more currency circulation be secured for the country, together with a free-banking law guarded by such provisions and regulations as prudence and safety may require. I suppose that may now lie on the table.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it had better be referred to the Committee on Finance. We shall probably have a proposition for a further increase before the session closes.

Mr. SCOTT. I shall not object to the reference if the Senator from Rhode Island proposes it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the memorial of Lucius R. Eastman, of Boston, Massachusetts, praying that arbitration be substituted for war as a means of settlement of international difficulties; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. OGLESBY. I present concurrent resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, relative to rates of freight and passage on the Union Pacific Railroad and branches. I move their reference to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest in connection with that resolution that the Judiciary Committee have the same subject in charge, and therefore I think a reference to that committee would be proper.

Mr. OGLESBY. Very well; let the reference be changed accordingly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 553) for the retirement of the national-bank notes, for the refunding of the non-taxable bonds into a 5½ per cent. interchangeable bond, and for the resumption of specie payments; the bill (S. No. 461) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864; the bill (S. No. 421) to amend section 6 of the act of March 3, 1865, amended July 13, 1866, imposing a tax of 10 per cent. on the circulation of State-bank notes; the bill (S. No. 430) to provide for the redemption and reissue of United States notes and national-bank notes, and for free banking; the bill (S. No. 315) to provide for the gradual withdrawal from circulation of irredeemable national notes, and the substitution therefor of redeemable national-bank notes, to remove unjust restrictions upon banks of issue, and upon the amount of circulation; the bill (S. No. 301) to secure the resumption of specie payments without contracting the currency; the bill (S. No. 30) to provide for free banking, to secure an elastic currency, to appreciate national obligations, and to reach specie payments without commercial embarrassment; the bill (S. No. 3) to authorize compound-interest notes as a substitute for legal-tender notes; and the bill (S. No. 203) to facilitate assorting and redeeming national-bank note currency, and to authorize the issue of circulating notes to the amount of 92 per cent. in lieu of the 90 per cent. now authorized by law, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, the subject-matter having been covered by the bill passed yesterday; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred various petitions of citizens of the United States on the subject of the currency, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 452) for the relief of John McHarg, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth collection district of the State of New York, reported it with an amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1768) for the relief of Ephraim P. Showalter, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2074) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of a military prison and for its government," approved March 3, 1873, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I regret very much to say that I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 124) providing for the resumption of specie payments and for free banking, to report it back adversely. Mr. President, you know, no one knows better, that we have no right to disclose what takes place in committee; but I may say that you are well aware that all committees are composed of odd numbers, and if a committee is made up of seven, and three are in favor of a bill and three against it, and the seventh man a little mixed, somewhat for it and somewhat against it, the bill has to be reported adversely; and although this bill seems particularly appropriate to be adopted now after the passage of the bill acted on yesterday, I am compelled to report this bill adversely; but I will ask to have it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be indefinitely postponed if there be no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let it be placed on the Calendar in order that I may hereafter offer it as a substitute for whatever may come up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report.

Mr. SCOTT. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report adversely the bill (S. No. 408) to provide for the refunding of internal-revenue taxes improperly assessed and collected. This is a bill in which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] not now in his seat is interested, and in his absence I will ask that it go on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1313) for the relief of Alexander Burtch, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 526) for the relief of James DeLong, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

ASBURY DICKINS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1580) for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] who reported this bill, or who at least made the report of the majority of the committee, is not in his seat at present; and I suggest to the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. MITCHELL,] who made the minority report, that he allow it to lie over until the Senator from Pennsylvania comes in.

Mr. RAMSEY. He was here a moment ago.

Mr. MITCHELL. While the Senator from Pennsylvania is coming in I will submit a few remarks. I do not desire to occupy the attention of the Senate long in regard to this matter; but I think it is no more than justice to the minority of the committee that a few words should be said in support of the minority report.

The honorable chairman of the committee has based his opposition to this bill principally upon the ground that the legislation in existence at the time these services were performed really prohibited the payment of such a claim as this; and in support of that position reference has been made to the act of 1818, and it is claimed that a fair construction of that act prohibits the payment of this claim. Without stopping to argue as to the proper construction of that act, I will content myself by referring very briefly to what other Senators in years gone by and other committees and other Senates and other Houses of Representatives have thought and said on this subject. I propose to refer to what Senator Brodhead, one of the predecessors of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Claims, said on this subject when this same case was before the Senate in 1856. I now quote from the Congressional Globe, Thirty-fourth Congress, first session, 1855–'56, part 3, page 1609:

> The bill (S. No. 314) for the relief of Asbury Dickins was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.
> The bill, as reported from the Court of Claims, proposed to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Asbury Dickins $1,395.88 for his services as Acting Secretary of the Treasury at various times between the 24th of April, 1829, and the 31st of May, 1833; and also the sum of $3,693.37 for his services as Acting Secretary of State at various times between the 10th of August, 1833, and the 9th of November, 1836; also, the sum of $261.46 for his services as chief clerk in the Treasury Department from the 21st of June, 1831, to the 7th of August, 1831.
> The Committee on Claims propose to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following.

That was an amendment which provided substantially the same compensation that is provided by the bill now pending before the Senate. The Court of Claims, as the Senate will bear in mind, decided that Mr. Dickins was entitled to his full salary as Acting Secretary of State and Acting Secretary of the Treasury, although he had received his full salary as chief clerk of those Departments. The Senate committee proposed an amendment by which they would only pay him the difference between what he had received as chief clerk and what he was entitled to as an acting Cabinet officer. When this amendment was submitted, Senator Adams, of Mississippi, said:

> I think the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] desires to make a question on this bill, and discuss the proposed amendment. After having appointed a court, and authorized them to settle such questions, and provided for having their adjudications brought here as the judgment of a court, I am unwilling to revise and change and alter them. I think we ought either to repeal the law, or to abide by their decisions. As is known to the Senate, I have been as much opposed to claims of this character as any other Senator; but we have constituted a court, and we have provided an attorney to represent the Government, so that both sides may be heard there.

I call the attention of the Senate to this, as the minority report in this instance seems to be regarded by some as not supported by either law or fact.

Senator Adams said further:

> This is an advantage which the Senate can never enjoy. The court hears both sides of a question; and whether they decide according to my judgment or not, I have agreed, by my vote for the bill constituting that court, to leave whatever claim a party may think proper to present against the Government to their decision, and I am unwilling to attempt to revise their decisions.
> What they have decided I shall vote to confirm, unless it can be shown, not that they have been mistaken in their judgment, but that some fraud has been practiced upon them, or that there has been corruption in the court. Their judgment is the decree of a chancery court having investigated the question by authority of the Congress of the United States. Whether they have decided right or wrong, we have made them a court to settle the question, and by their decision I will abide or vote to repeal the law.

Mr. Brodhead, Senator from Pennsylvania, said this, and I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to his view in reference to the character of the existing law at that time:

> I have confidence in the Court of Claims, though the committee have reported a substitute for the bill which the court recommend. I will briefly state the case. Mr. Dickins, and two other gentlemen who are mentioned in the bills which follow, were chief clerks in the Departments. They were appointed by the President of the United States at different periods to discharge the duties of the heads of the Departments. Under a decision of the circuit court of the United States, sitting in Baltimore, the Court of Claims determined that these gentlemen were entitled to both salaries—the salary of the head of the Department and that of the chief clerk. The Committee on Claims decided to give the claimants the higher salary, deducting the amount they had already received.
> We did this without undertaking to say that the court had not decided the legal claim correctly, because I think that under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States Judge Blackford, who delivered the opinion, was right in deciding as he did; but Congress, on such matters, is not bound by the decision of the Supreme Court or any other court governed by strict legal rules. Therefore, without impugning the decision of the Court of Claims, without saying that the court is not a useful institution, we have reported this substitute allowing the higher salary, and not giving both.—Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-fourth Congress, part 3, page 1609.

No Senator, during that whole discussion, ever pretended to claim that he was not entitled to the difference as a matter of compromise, if the Senate desired to compromise with the question at all. A part of the Senate insisted that he was entitled to the full salary; the other portion of the Senate that took part in the discussion insisted that he should only have the difference; but no Senator at that time was found to assert that the law prohibited the payment of one or the other; not one. Furthermore Mr. Hunter said:

> Mr. HUNTER. I would ask the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania if a law has not been passed since that case arose which requires that only one salary shall be paid, and that the highest?
> Mr. BRODHEAD. That is the law now; but at the time when this claim arose there was no such provision on the subject, and the parties had their claim adjudicated on the law as it stood at that time.
> Mr. HUNTER. If that be the case, it seems to me that no great mischief can arise from sustaining the judgment of the Court of Claims. They have decided, as the Senator from Pennsylvania admits, according to the law of the case as the law then was. Although we may think, and I do think, it was improper to allow them both salaries, they were entitled to it if the law was such.—Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-fourth Congress, part 3, page 1610.

So say I, Mr. President. I will go with the honorable chairman of the Committee on Claims to the fullest extent in refusing to recognize any claim that may be made here, the payment of which rests in the grace of the Senate; but when a claim is presented, as in this case, where the question is raised as to the liability of the Government under an existing law for services rendered by a party to the Government, then I do not consider that there is any grace about it; it is a matter of liability. All the Senators contended at that time that the Government was liable equitably under the law as it existed then to pay for these services. Senator Brodhead said: "That is the law now"—that is, since 1839 and 1843—"but before that time, at the time these services were rendered, it was not the law, and therefore the Government is liable" to pay for services rendered at that time in pursuance of the act of 1792.

Now, one other matter, and I shall not detain the Senate further, because I know how unwilling the Senate is to listen to these applications for the payment of private claims. I simply desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this identical bill has passed the Senate of the United States three different times. It passed the Senate March 10, 1854, July 11, 1856, and June 6, 1860. There have been as many reports in favor of this claim from as many different Senate committees—one by Mr. Brodhead in 1854, one by Mr. Iverson in 1859, another by Mr. Davis in 1868. There have been four reports from House committees by such men as Mr. Fessenden, of Maine, Mr. MAYNARD, of Tennessee, and Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, all able lawyers—no less than eight different reports in the two branches of Congress identical with the report made in this case by the minority of the Committee on Claims.

I simply thought it right that I should say this much in support of the views taken by the minority. In the face of this record, if the Senate desire to repudiate the claim, (because that is what it amounts to,) I shall be content, of course.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I have had hesitation in saying a word on this subject; and first, for the reason that I am pretty well satisfied that what may be said by us here upon a subject of this kind, in view of the engagements of Senators otherwise, and their conviction perhaps that it were well to leave these matters to the committee, and the little interest they feel in the case itself, will probably receive but little attention.

In the second place, I have had very great hesitation for the reason that I know it is a most ungracious task to undertake to contest what is termed "a small bill," a small demand against the Government. I know that Senators are apt to say this is only three or four thousand dollars, and it is not a very nice thing for the Senate here to be contesting the right of a claimant to three or four thousand dollars, and therefore the easier and better way to get rid of it is to dispose of it and allow the bill. Now, as I think this bill involves a vast deal more than that, I wish to state very briefly the reasons which influenced me in concurring with the majority report and which will influence my vote against this bill.

I say the question in this case involves more than the three or four thousand dollars; for if this claim coming in twenty years or thirteen years—I believe the claim was presented in the House first thirteen years after the services were rendered, and twenty years after the services were rendered the claim was first presented in the Senate—if there be no such thing as a statute of limitations, and we all concede that, then for all the services that were rendered by persons similarly situated to Mr. Dickins, the same claim can be made and the Senate will be bound in equity and in law to allow it. It is true that no statute of limitations applies here, and that a claimant can present his claim to one Congress after another and have it decided against him, and he can go to the courts of the country and there be decided against, and he can go to the Departments and there be decided against, and he can still come to Congress, and there is nothing to prevent such petitioning and such asking; but I have seriously thought whether it were not better in some way, by constitutional provision or otherwise, to cut off these claims and require that a claimant should come before Congress within a definite number of years or else be barred of his claim. These claims are growing in magnitude and in number; and I can safely say that one-half the time of the Senate and of its committees is taken up in the investigation of such claims. Now, let us see what is the nature of this claim.

The claimant insists that he is entitled to compensation for some three hundred and fifty days, commencing in April, 1829, and concluding in November, 1836, for his services when acting as Secretary ad interim of the Treasury and of the State Departments. I beg Senators to look at the nature of this claim. He claims, among other things, that from May 6 to May 9, 1833, he served four days, from May 29, 1833, to May 31, 1833, he served three days; and so there are nine days, eight days, and five days, and in some instances they amount as high as forty days that he says he was serving in this capacity, and therefore is entitled to compensation. And yet with a full knowledge, as we are bound to presume, that he was entitled to this compensation, he rested for thirteen years without making any claim upon Congress when he says he was entitled to between four and five thousand dollars for the services thus rendered, or until from thirteen to twenty years before he made any claim.

Mr. President, I was more than pleased the other day, as I always am, in hearing the glowing words and the flowing numbers of the Senator from Rhode Island now occupying the chair [Mr. ANTHONY] when he spoke of this petitioner, of his services as Secretary of this Senate, of his occupying a seat at the desk, and being a companion and friend of those who occupied places here at the same time; and yet when all was through, I could not help asking the matter-of-fact question, "What of it?" If this man was entitled to compensation for these services, it made no difference, as far as I can see, whether he was ever Secretary of this Senate or not; except this fact is important to be considered by the Senate that he was here in a position knowing what his rights were, here associating with those who knew of him and knew of his services and qualifications, and never one word was uttered with reference to his claim before this body until nearly twenty years after the services were rendered.

I submit that at the time these services were rendered there was no law of Congress that allowed this man any compensation. He rendered the service as by an appointment pro tempore. Notwithstanding the decision of the Court of Claims, it was immediately determined by the committee in the House that he was not entitled to such compensation; and while my friends from Oregon and Indiana talk about the sacredness and the binding force and effect of the judgment of the Court of Claims, it is to be borne in mind that there was a simple finding in that case, no judgment. And not only so, I submit that they themselves conceded that that judgment was wrong, because that court found that he was not only entitled to compensation for his services as Secretary ad interim in those places, but also for his services as chief clerk. No one pretends that that is right.

I suggest also to my friend from Indiana, who has such great respect for the judgments of courts, that I remember a case not more than a year since where there was a judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States expressly against a claimant, and where $112,000 was involved, and yet he found his way clear to allow that same claimant $39,000 in the face of that judgment of the highest court in this land.

Now here was a finding of the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims reached a conclusion that we all concede was erroneous. Immediately after that finding was presented to Congress——

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Iowa says we all concede that the judgment or the award of the Court of Claims was erroneous. I do not concede it, for one. I do not believe it was erroneous. I believe it was in strict accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I do not think any Senator ever contended that it was erroneous. They all admit substantially that under the law as it existed at that time Mr. Dickins was entitled to the full salary, but the Congress of the United States, or rather the committees of the two Houses that had this matter under discussion, thought that inasmuch as he had received one salary, while he might be entitled to the full salary under the strict letter of the law and under the decision of the Court of Claims, yet it would be sufficient under the circumstances to pay him the difference between what he had received and the amount he was entitled to receive as Acting Secretary of the Treasury and of State ad interim.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the Senator from Oregon in the minority report finds in favor of this claimant not compensation for his services as chief clerk and also as Secretary, but he finds in his favor the difference between the two salaries.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is correct. What I mean is that, as a strict matter of law, he would be entitled to the whole.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I understand that while the Senator is a stickler here, according to his argument, for this claim on the ground that the party is entitled to it as matter of strict law, he nevertheless yields that entirely when he surrenders one-third of the claim.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do it in deference to all that has been said on this subject by previous committees composed of the ablest men of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. WRIGHT. When a matter of principle is involved, no ground of deference can justify a departure from it. If this claimant is entitled as a matter of principle to the entire amount, the Senator from Oregon ought to stand there and not yield any portion of it. He puts the claim as to every portion of it upon strict law, and yet abandons one-third of it which he says the party is as much entitled to as the remainder. If there is any claim here, the Senator insists that it is a matter of strict law. Aside from the strict law, I do not think any Senator will pretend that this man ought to be paid, for the reason that no one contemplated at the time these services were rendered that such persons were to have compensation, and it was only after one or two persons had been allowed compensation that this claimant thought probably that he was entitled to such compensation also.

But, Mr. President, I regret having taken up so much time. I only desired to say that I shall vote against this claim. If, as some one suggested here the other day, this Government of ours were an eleemosynary institution, to give away money as a matter of charity, perhaps I should have no objection to voting for the bill; or if we held the funds of the Government not in strict trust, but to dispose of at our own pleasure and will according to our feelings in individual cases, I might be disposed to vote for the bill; but the trust that I accept here is a strict trust, and I have no right or power to vote a dollar from the Treasury for a claim that I do not believe to be just and right.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to ask him a question for information: Was the service charged for in this account performed, and has it ever been paid for?

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly, the services have been performed; but they were performed by a person who was at that time in the service of the Government and who was paid for his services as a clerk.

The fact that for a few days he may have been detailed to discharge other duties is no reason why he should have additional compensation by any means.

I was about saying, Mr. President, that in my judgment the trust we have to execute is a strict trust. We have no right and no power to vote the money of the people as we would vote our own money influenced and controlled by feeling or sentiment merely. The question we have to determine is whether this person is entitled to this money, whether we in our places have any right to take this money of the people and vote it to this man or to any one because we may think it is a hard case. Hard cases should never allow or justify the making of bad law.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, the questions which my friend from Delaware propounded to the honorable Senator who has just taken his seat were very pertinent questions. The first question was, Have the services been performed? and the next question was, Have they been paid for? and both of those questions must be answered, the first in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

But, sir, were they services that the Congress of the United States ought to pay for? Were they legal services? If anything can be established by judicial authority, by the opinions of the highest law officer of the Government, this is not only a legal claim, but it is an equitable claim and ought to be paid.

My honorable friend says that Mr. Dickins was late in coming to Congress. Sir, he did not come to Congress until a court established for the purpose of adjudicating upon claims of this character had had this case under full consideration and determined that, under the law as it was, Asbury Dickins was entitled to be paid for three hundred and fifty-nine days of service rendered as Secretary of the Treasury and Secretary of State. When that decision was made, Mr. Dickins came to Congress, and during the whole residue of his life he was a suitor here for justice, and his legatees since his death have been here constantly up to the present time. They do not ask this compensation as a matter of grace, but as a matter of sheer justice under the law as announced not only by the Court of Claims, but by the Supreme Court of the United States.

When I had occasion to address the Senate on Friday last upon this question, I cited two opinions from Attorney-General Wirt where the same question was involved. I had not the time then to refer to subsequent opinions delivered by Attorneys-General Legare and Cushing. I have them before me, and I would cheerfully read them to the Senate if time allowed; but I prefer quoting to the Senate now, in concluding, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon a question that involved the very principle that we are discussing here. I refer to the claim of Mr. White against the United States, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1851, Chief Justice Taney pronouncing the opinion. This White was a Navy agent, and he had been designated by the Secretary of the Navy while he was Navy agent to discharge the duties of purser. The salary of purser at that time was $1,500 a year, and it was objected that he was not entitled to the compensation of Navy agent and purser at the same time. I have the opinion of Chief Justice Taney here before me, and if the Senate will pardon me I will read a brief extract from that opinion:

> The act of Congress fixes the salary of purser, when not otherwise provided for, at $1,500 a year. As the defendant performed all the duties of the office, and performed them in the name and in the character of purser, he is entitled to the compensation which the law has provided for such services. The circumstance that he held the office of Navy agent at the same time can make no difference. There is no law which prohibits a person from holding two offices at the same time.

I beg my honorable friend from Iowa to consider whether his opinion expressed a few moments ago can stand against that of the Supreme Court of the United States upon that question:

> As a matter of policy it would certainly be highly objectionable in most cases as a permanent arrangement; but in the absence of any legal provision to the contrary, this appointment was valid. Indeed, it often happens that in unexpected contingencies, and for temporary purposes, the appointment of a person already in office to execute the duties of another office is more convenient and useful to the public than to bring in a new officer to execute the duty. And if the duties of the second office are performed, and the law has fixed the compensation which it deems just for such services, it cannot be material whether they are rendered by one holding another office or not, provided they are faithfully discharged.

This opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States was cited by the Court of Claims, and their opinion rested in a measure upon the decision of the Supreme Court; and let me say to the Senator from Iowa that that rule has never been shaken to this day. No Senator who has spoken against this claim pretends that this opinion has ever been overruled, the opinion of either the Court of Claims or the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of White vs. The United States.

If I had time, as I said before, I would be glad to read the opinion of Attorney-General Legare in the case of Mr. Young, who was chief clerk in the Treasury Department, and just like Mr. Dickins served as Acting Secretary of the Treasury, and which was referred to the Attorney-General for his opinion, whether Mr. Young could claim compensation for discharging the duties of both offices at the same time; and his opinion was clear and explicit that that was the law; and it continued to be the law down to 1839.

My honorable friend from Iowa is very much afraid that if Congress shall pass upon and allow this claim, other claims will spring up appealing to Congress for relief upon the same grounds upon which this is urged. Let me say that no such claim can arise and ask to be recognized which has been created since the year 1839; but until that year the authorities are unbroken, as I said before, that such claims were valid and that there was no escape from their payment.

Mr. President, if I comprehend the duty of Congress, it is to pay the debts of the United States. That is one of the reasons for which we may levy taxes, "to pay the debts of the United States;" and here is a debt that has been determined to be a valid claim against the United States by the very court instituted by Congress to pass upon such claims. That decision, as I have said before, has never been overruled. It is sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States. How can we then with clean consciences afford to deny this claimant this compensation resting upon such authority?

I will not detain the Senate longer. I had much more to say; but I observe that the morning hour is nearly expiring.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If this bill proposed merely to give the sum of $3,000 or $4,000 or even $5,000 as a mere act of benevolence, I do not know that I should object to it; but when the Senator from Indiana says that the precedents on this subject have been unbroken from the foundation of the Government until the passage of the act of 1839, I must controvert the assertion.

Mr. PRATT. I spoke of the judicial precedents.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. And I ask the Senator to look at the supplement to the Congressional Globe of the second session of the Fortieth Congress, 1868, containing the impeachment trial. There he will find a list of such cases, covering six or seven pages, which would inevitably come up provided this claim should pass. Why, sir, the book contains pages of them, one after another, year after year; and the idea that we can pass this claim and not have any others come up is put forth here with more assurance than I should suppose was possible.

Mr. PRATT. Allow me one moment——

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I undertake to say that there would be hundreds of them that would come up, and that this involves not less than half a million dollars, and perhaps much more. I move now to lay the bill on the table and have done with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Vermont moves to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Boutwell, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Ingalls, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Schurz, Scott, Tipton, and Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Cameron, Cooper, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Saulsbury, Spencer, Stewart, Stockton, Wadleigh, and West—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Brownlow, Buckingham, Carpenter, Conover, Davis, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Jones, Logan, Oglesby, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, and Windom—24.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, notwithstanding the vote just taken, I consider it my duty not to permit the Senate to come to a final vote on this bill without one or two remarks more upon the effect of passing it. I need not disclaim what I have frequently disclaimed, any other feeling about this bill than that of the discharge of public duty. Standing where I do as chairman of the Committee on Claims and understanding how easy it is for those who represent such claims as this to find access to the hearts of Senators and how difficult it is to keep the doors of the Treasury barred against claims of this character where the hearts of Senators are enlisted, I still must ask them to consider whether they are willing, with this case as a precedent, to encounter the responsibility which its passage will involve us in?

The point upon which this case turns has been well stated by the Senator from Iowa. Let me ask the attention of the lawyers of the Senate to that point. The decision of the Court of Claims is invoked as establishing the justice of this claim. If it does establish the justice of this claim, then the Senate is doing a great injustice to these claimants in not voting every dollar which the Court of Claims awarded to him whom they represent. The Court of Claims decided that Asbury Dickins held two offices and that he was entitled to pay for both those offices. He was chief clerk of each of two Departments, and during a certain period he performed the duties of the head of each Department; and the effect of that decision was that he was both chief clerk and Secretary of State; that he was both chief clerk and Secretary of the Treasury Department; that as such he was entitled first to the salary of chief clerk, and second to the salary of the head of each Department, and having been paid in full for his services as chief clerk, that court made a report awarding him the salary of the head of the Department in full, in addition to his salary as the chief clerk of the Department.

If that decision had the binding effect which some Senators say it ought to have, why do they not follow it and vote the whole amount? Because it is conceded that the opinion of the court is not tenable on that ground. He did not hold two offices. He could not, as I argue, hold those two offices. There is a constitutional barrier against his being considered the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of State. The act of 1792 simply authorized the President to appoint a man for the time being in case of certain disabilities to perform the duties of those offices; but the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of State cannot be made such without a nomination to the Senate and a confirmation by the Senate. Then the ground upon which the decision of the Court of Claims rested is abandoned.

When the bill passed the Senate in the first instance and went to the House of Representatives, the House sent it to the Court of Claims. When that report of the Court of Claims came to the House, the House refused to sanction it when everything was fresh before it; and now, and ever since for twenty years, this claim has been sent back from House to Senate and from Senate to House, playing battledore and shuttlecock with it all the time, and for the greater part of the time its advocates abandoning the ground on which the Court of Claims based their decision; and to-day those who claim that this bill ought to pass agree that it would be utterly inequitable to pay again the full salary of Secretary of State and the salary of chief clerk, but agree that all that ought to be demanded is the difference between the higher and the lower salary.

The ground, then, of the decision is abandoned, and what do we come to? If it is not true that he held two offices and that he can be paid the salary of both, then I quote the act of 1818 as a legal bar against his claim; and why do I do it? Because he was only chief clerk, and that act as a bar says distinctly you shall have no higher salary than that of chief clerk, and you shall have no other salary than that of chief clerk. He held but one office; true, by virtue of that he was detailed to perform for the time being the duties of the other; but so long as he was the chief clerk of either of these Departments the act of 1818 stood in the way of his being paid any other salary than that of chief clerk or any higher salary than that of chief clerk.

Mr. PRATT. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. PRATT. Was not the act of 1818 before the Court of Claims at the time the decision was made in the case of Asbury Dickins vs. The United States? Was not that act before the Supreme Court of the United States at the time the case of White vs. The United States was decided, and must not both these courts in their decisions have ignored the act of 1818 as applicable to this question at all?

Mr. SCOTT. I would have answered that question in another form if my friend had delayed his inquiry. The question which the Supreme Court of the United States considered and decided, the question which every Attorney-General to whom such matters have been submitted has decided, has been not whether the person held two offices, but whether the two offices were incompatible with each other. The question of the purser in the Navy, I believe it was, and some other officer that was presented, was not did he hold two offices under the act of 1792; but were the two offices which he did hold incompatible with each other; and they decided that they were not. Now the ground upon which I am arguing this case is not that Mr. Dickins held two offices one of which was incompatible with the other, but that he held only one office, the office of chief clerk, and that holding only one office the act of 1818 is a bar right across his way to claim any greater or other salary than the one affixed to that office.

Mr. PRATT. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him again? How does he reconcile his present position with the opinion which Attorney-General Legare gave in the case of Mr. Young, who was chief clerk of the Treasury Department, and who preferred his claim for services similar to those performed by Mr. Dickins? Both of them were chief clerk in the Treasury Department and performed the duties of Secretary of the Treasury ad interim. Now what does Mr. Legare say?

> In the matter of Mr. Young's claim, I am of opinion that the Secretary of the Treasury ad interim, appointed by virtue of an express law, has a claim upon the Government for the usual, or, if there be no usual, for a reasonable compensation for his services in that capacity.

Mr. SCOTT. I answer in this way: The sentence itself is a confirmation of the very position which I have taken. If he could hold the office of Secretary of the Treasury and the office of chief clerk, I ask the Senator from Indiana did not the law itself fix the salary of both; and yet this Attorney-General speaks of there being a usual compensation, or if there be not a usual, a reasonable compensation, showing that he did not himself pass upon the question of whether this man was Secretary of the Treasury and chief clerk or Secretary of State and chief clerk, but that he was considering it simply as an equitable claim. Had he been of the opinion that the claimant in that case was Secretary of the Treasury, the act of 1818 fixed the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury just as it did the salary of chief clerk. Had he been of opinion that he was Secretary of State and chief clerk, the act of 1818 fixed the salaries of both those officers, and there could have been no question whatever about their usual or reasonable compensation.

Mr. President, I have referred to the act of 1818, which I say stands as a bar across this claimant's right; but after 1818 on until 1839 claims of this kind began to multiply, and the question was presented to Congress, does such a case make an equitable claim? There were numbers of them; and right across the claims in such cases was thrown the act of 1839, which was not simply a declaration that in the future no such salaries should be paid, but was a declaration that as to the past no such salaries ought to be paid; and we there meet the question of an equitable claim just as decidedly as we do that of a legal claim by the act of 1818.

Mr. PRATT. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question? That act of 1839 was in force at the time the Court of Claims passed upon the claim of Asbury Dickins. It was likewise in force at the time the Supreme Court of the United States, at the April term, 1851, decided the case of the Navy agent, White against the United States. And yet neither of these courts pretended that the act of 1839 was retroactive so as to cut these claims.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, Mr. President, as to the case of the Navy agent, let me refresh my friend's recollection. The act of 1818 had no earthly application to the case of the Navy agent at all, for it applied only to the organization of the Departments of State, the Treasury, and War, so that the Supreme Court had nothing to do with the act of 1818, so far as that case of the Navy agent was concerned; and in the case which we are considering, as I have already shown, the Senator from Indiana himself abandons the decision of the Court of Claims and says it cannot be sustained. You get back to an equitable claim. The act of 1818 defeats your legal claim, and the act of 1839 is an expression of the policy of the Government against the equity of all such claims; and we are therefore brought to the question, will we open up the flood-gate to the claims which would pour in upon us as shown by the quotation I made the other day, and which was repeated this morning by the Senator from Vermont of six or eight pages of the Congressional Globe covered with just such cases as this?

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. SCOTT. I am nearly through.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to ask a question.

Mr. SCOTT. I will give way to a question.

Mr. MITCHELL. I want to inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania whether he insists now—I understood him to insist the other day and I also understood the Senator from Vermont to insist this morning—that this case would set a precedent for some four or five hundred cases, and the Congressional Globe was referred to. I desire to know if it is insisted now that that is the fact?

Mr. SCOTT. I have looked in the record in the Congressional Globe referred to, and there are certainly some five or six pages covered with the names of persons who have been from time to time assigned under the act of 1792 to perform duties different from those which their offices required of them.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, in answer to that, if the Senator will allow me, because I know he does not wish to convey a false impression to the Senate, I will say that at the time the impeachment of President Johnson was under consideration in the Senate the information was called for which has been referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania and by the Senator from Vermont. There are contained on these four or five pages all the appointments of ad interim Cabinet officers made from the foundation of the Government up to that date; and nine-tenths of the whole list consist of cases of persons appointed since the act of 1839; and when you consider the list which would come under this precedent you will find that it only includes the appointments made by President Jackson and a portion of those in Mr. Van Buren's time. That whole list, instead of being four or five hundred cases, amounts to about ninety-five.

Mr. PRATT. Ninety-six.

Mr. MITCHELL. Ninety-six all told. Of these ninety-six eighteen are the appointments of Asbury Dickins, ten as acting Secretary of State and eight as acting Secretary of the Treasury.

Then, again, the act of 1792 only provided for temporary appointments or appointments ad interim for three of the Departments, not for all the Cabinet positions as I remember, but only for the three Departments, State, Treasury, and War. When you come to look over this list of ninety-six you will find that some thirty of them, I think—I have glanced over the list—were of officers in the other Departments, in the Departments of the Postmaster-General, of the Attorney-General, and of the Secretary of the Navy. So then when you come to deduct those who were appointed in these three different Departments that were not included in the act of 1792, and when you come to deduct the matter under consideration of eighteen appointments of Asbury Dickins, and when you come to deduct in addition to all that twenty-nine other cases that have already been paid by the auditing officers of the Government under the act of 1792, there is not a baker's dozen left, if any, that would come in under any precedent that might be established by the passage of this bill.

Now, Mr. President, I hope no Senator will be frightened by any such argument as that; and arguments of this kind only show, either that the Senators who make them here have not investigated the case, have not taken the trouble to look into it, or that for some other reason they are not as careful as they might be in regard to their statements about this matter, because it was broadly stated this morning by the Senator from Vermont, and just as broadly asserted the other day by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that we were now about to establish a precedent that would open the flood-gates and let in claims amounting to perhaps half a million dollars or more. That is not the case, I say in all candor and sincerity, as the Senate will see if they will examine this very record to which they have referred. I will send it to the Senator from Pennsylvania and ask him to look at it.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, that is the most extraordinary question I ever yielded for, and if I could find out what it was, I would endeavor to answer it, [laughter;] but I can see very readily how the young ladies who have charge of this bill have gotten hold of the honorable Senator who occupies the chair [Mr. ANTHONY] and many other honorable Senators to such an extent that I am perhaps engaging in a vain fight here for the purpose of guarding the Treasury against the sympathy which they have enlisted in the Senate for the passage of this bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. They seem to have controlled a majority of the Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. Perhaps they have. I have failed to remember the question which the Senator rose to propound to me. [Laughter.] I remember the argument about this list of cases, and it closed with a most extraordinary statement that those of us who had been using it had not been very careful about our statements in regard to it. Now, sir, I have not taken the trouble to count these cases, but I have looked at them, and found that on page 187 of the supplement to the Globe containing the impeachment trial this occurred:

The CHIEF JUSTICE. Will the counsel state what he proposes to offer?

Mr. CURTIS. These are documents from the Department of State showing the removal of officers not only during the session of the Senate but during the recess, and covering all cases of vacancy, the purpose of the evidence being to show the practice of the Government coextensive with the necessity that arises out of the different cases—death, resignation, sickness, absence, removal. It differs from the schedule which has been put in by the learned managers, which covered certain heads of Departments only, because that applies only to removals during the session of the Senate. It includes that, but it includes a great deal more matter.

Mr. Manager BUTLER. I have prepared for myself the same list. In order that the Senate may see exactly what the character is, and may judge then how far this may be competent, I call the attention of the Senate to one, the first one that opens—not by any manner the first in order, but the first one that happens:

"I hereby appoint C. A. Harris to perform the duties of Acting Secretary of War during the temporary absence of the Secretary for the Department of War.

"ANDREW JACKSON.

"MAY 27, 1836."

And then, beginning on page 188, follows the list of appointments of this character; it runs to page 191, where there is a message from President Buchanan dated in 1861, showing the number of such appointments that had been made until that time under this act of 1792, and there any Senator can see how many there are, [holding up the book.] There may be numerous appointments of the same person, but here are three columns on page 192, as many on page 193, as many on page 194; and then, I do not know what the character of the succeeding list is, but I believe it runs on from 1860 up to the time of the trial over pages 195 and 196. I have not counted these cases; but here they are. I do not know how often the same name occurs.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have counted them.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not know how the Senator can find but ninety-five or ninety-six in all on all these four pages; but let that be as it may, I have never yet undertaken to see how many there were; I quoted the pages before, and the Senator has gone to the trouble to count them. The point in it is this: it is not simply a question of whether we shall pay the cases that occurred before 1839, but whether we shall establish a precedent which says that the act of 1839 ought to be blotted from the statute-books. This case is not simply one of law as to the time preceding 1839, but it is one of policy as to all time; and the very ground upon which this bill is passed will blot from the statute-book all the acts from 1839, 1842, and 1848, because——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Has the Senator got the act of 1818 there?

Mr. SCOTT. I have not got the act of 1818; but I have the section which bears on this matter.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is all I wish.

Mr. SCOTT. I can quote it if the Senator desires.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If you please.

Mr. SCOTT. It reads as follows:

SEC. 9. That the compensation allowed by this act to clerks shall commence from and after the 31st day of March last, and it shall be the duty of the Secretaries for the Departments of State, Treasury, War, and Navy, of the Commissioners of the Navy, and the Postmaster-General, to report to Congress at the beginning of each year the names of the clerks they have employed respectively in the preceding year, together with the time each clerk was actively employed during the year, and the sums paid to each; and no higher or other allowance shall be made to any clerk in the said Departments and offices than is authorized by this act.

That is the section. I do not wish to take up time; I only rose to call the attention of the Senate to the effect of the passage of this bill, and I do it in no hostility to the bill itself. It is for the purpose of guarding the Treasury against the number of cases that will come in consequence of this precedent. Do not tell me that they are old cases, and that they will not come. Asbury Dickins is dead, but his legatees are here; and time will not keep away the legatees and the heirs at law and the administrators who will disinter all these claims from 1818 up until the present time if we give them encouragement.

I think I shall not be tempted again to speak upon this subject. I have been tempted to speak thus far by reason of the interruptions which have been made during the remarks I have now ventured to make in anticipation of the final vote on this bill. If the Senate, in full view of all that has been said, shall instruct the Committee on Claims to encourage these bills, to pay all that may be resurrected from 1819 down to the present time, to say that the policy of the laws of 1839 and 1842 is not founded in the public interest—if they see proper so to instruct us, very well; we shall have discharged what we deemed our duty upon the threshold of that instruction.

Mr. PRATT. I rise simply for the purpose of replying to two points made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. The first is as to the application of the act of 1818 to this question. Now, sir, if the Senate has any respect whatever for the opinion of Justice Blackford of the Court of Claims, that question is settled, and settled forever. He had this act of 1818 before him. It was cited then, as now, against the claim of Asbury Dickins, as barring it. That section has just been read in the hearing of the Senate. I will not read it over again, but I will read the comments of Judge Blackford upon the meaning of that section. He says:

The meaning of that part of the above section, relied on by the Solicitor, is only this: that no such clerk as there referred to shall receive any other compensation, as clerk, than what the act allows. It does not affect the question, whether the claimant is not entitled, besides his salary as clerk, to a compensation, and, if any, to what amount, for his discharge of the duties of the other offices conferred on him.

I could not, if I would, add anything which would strengthen that exposition of the meaning and application of the act of 1818.

Let me refer to one other point which the Senator has made, and then I shall have done. His attention had been called by my friend from Oregon to the list which has been mentioned as printed in 1868 during the impeachment trial. I call the attention of the Senator now to that part of the list found on page 192 of the Globe supplement. It is the beginning of the list. There are no cases before it. It commenced with March 4, 1829; but that part which I will quote extends down to the 3d of March, 1839, during Mr. Van Buren's administration The list contains all the cases where clerks or heads of Departments had served in other Departments during that entire period of time, and the number as stated by my friend from Oregon is ninety-six all told, and of that number who thus served in the capacity of Secretary ad interim I count up twenty-four, my friend makes it a little more; he makes it thirty—Cabinet officers who were discharging these duties and who were at the same time receiving in other Departments their legal salary of $6,000 a year. Of this entire number of ninety-six, there are, as my friend says, but a baker's dozen which remain that have not been settled; and a great many have been paid. In this list are seventeen cases where, like Mr. Dickins, the present claimant, parties had served in these capacities. I do not go further than March 3, 1839, because the act of Congress passed that year cut off forever claims of this kind; and none can ever come before Congress with any prospect of success that have originated since that time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, as I understand this case Mr. Dickins was chief clerk in the State Department and in the Treasury Department and was called upon to perform duties which did not pertain to his position as chief clerk in those Departments. He rendered that service, it is admitted, but he has never been paid for that service, as I understand. He made a claim. That claim was adjudicated in the Court of Claims, but they had no power to pay it and he came to Congress. Having died, his heirs now present it.

I am not governed in my views about this matter by any sympathies for the claimants, for I have not the pleasure of acquaintance with any of them; neither had I with Mr. Dickins. But I wish to say in connection with this case, in reply to what was said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the policy of this Government has been to pay the clerks of the Departments additional compensation for services rendered outside of their legitimate duties.

In the month of January last I introduced a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to inform the Senate what had been done with certain moneys appropriated on the 8th of May, 1872, for the employment of additional clerks and for additional compensation to clerks in his office; and on the 26th of February, 1874, he made a reply to that resolution, and in that reply he states what he has done with that money, and as a justification for his course he says:

I desire to state that additional compensation has been paid to the clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury since the year 1861 under the following appropriations.

He then specifies the different appropriations under which additional compensation had been paid to the clerks. On the 8th of May, 1872, $22,500 was appropriated to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to hire additional clerks and to pay additional compensation to the clerks in his office. He was called upon to state what he had done with the money, and he here gives a list of the employés in his office who received that compensation. Every dollar of that $22,500 was paid out by the Secretary of the Treasury as additional compensation to the clerks in his office. Not a dollar of it was used for the hiring of additional clerks; but there was paid to clerks already in his office under salaries the sum of $22,500.

Mr. CONKLING. What year was that?

Mr. SAULSBURY. That was for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873. I have here the names of those clerks. Nine of them received $1,200 each, additional compensation, and they were clerks at a salary of $1,800.

Mr. CONKLING. That I believe was out of a special fund and under a special provision of law directing and enabling the Secretary thus to dispose of it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly; I do not say it was not authorized by law. I only show that it has been the policy of Congress as well as of the Department, for Congress has made appropriations for that very thing, appropriations to hire additional clerks and to pay additional compensation to clerks already in the Department, and it was under an appropriation of that kind that these moneys were paid out. Here is a list of the officers. The chief clerk, who had a salary of $2,500, was paid an additional compensation of $1,000. The chief of the appointment division, who received a salary of $1,800, was paid $1,800 additional out of that appropriation. The chief of the warrant division, who received a salary of $1,800, was paid $1,200 additional compensation.

I will not go through the whole list of these officers. They will be found in the report of the Secretary in reply to a resolution which I had the honor to introduce in January last. Nor will I undertake to say that the policy which has been pursued was a wise policy. On the contrary, I do not think it was wise to make appropriations in advance and furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury or any other Secretary a sum of money to be disposed of in that way as he pleased. But I cite it for the purpose of showing that the policy of Congress has been to pay the clerks in the Departments additional compensation for services which they have rendered. I call attention to this matter in reply to the remark made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that it was against the policy which had been pursued by the Government to pay additional compensation for services rendered. I rose more for the purpose of bringing this fact distinctly before the Senate than for anything else in reference to this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. WRIGHT. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Cameron, Cooper, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Howe, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Spencer, Stockton, Tipton, and Wadleigh—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Boutwell, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Maryland, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Robertson, Schurz, Scott, Windom, and Wright—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Brownlow, Buckingham, Conover, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamlin, Harvey, Jones, Logan, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Sargent, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Thurman, and West—23.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HOWE. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

THOMAS B. WALLACE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 507) for the relief of Thomas B. Wallace, of Lexington, in the State of Missouri; which was read.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I object to that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. SCOTT. Let me inquire so that we may understand the mode of procedure, now that we are proceeding regularly with the Calendar after the morning hour, does one objection take a bill over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been the understanding under which the Calendar has been proceeded with thus far.

Mr. SCOTT. I only wish to understand it.

Mr. BOGY. I move to suspend the pending order and take up the bill which has just been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The reason of my interposing an objection here is because that bill would bring up a class of cases in reference to war claims. I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania to say that his committee had that subject under consideration and expected to make a report which would cover many of these cases, and therefore I think it better that this case should go over. At all events, this case would necessarily lead to a great deal of discussion.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator misunderstood me if he supposed that the Committee on Claims expected to make a special report in reference to war claims in general. I did state a few days since that there were a number of claims of this character already reported and others in the committee under consideration, the character of which, from our past experience in the Senate, would necessarily excite discussion, and that I expected to ask the Senate to set apart a day before very long for the consideration of those cases. This is one of that class of cases.

Mr. BOGY. I will ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if the committee is preparing a report upon this subject? I did not fully hear what he said?

Mr. SCOTT. The committee is not preparing a special report apart from any case. They are considering the cases as they arise.

Mr. BOGY. I will then state that the committee of which the Senator from Pennsylvania is chairman have made a report, unanimous I think, in favor of this bill already—report No. 109. I therefore move that the bill be taken up.

Mr. WRIGHT. The determination of this question in favor of the motion will take up the rest of the day upon this bill, I have no doubt, if it shall come before the Senate, for it involves the whole question referred to by the Senator from New Jersey.

I have another reason why I shall vote against this motion. The Senator from Massachusetts is upon the Committee on Claims, and has some notions upon this general subject that I should like to have presented to the Senate when the question shall come before us; and without being at all authorized to say that he will discuss the question when it shall come up, I think it would be better that it should go over and at least give some time, some day, when we can take up these cases and have them all discussed together. There are some half-dozen or dozen cases involving the same question, and if we take up this case we shall spend the whole day upon it. I think it would be better to go on with the Calendar and take up those cases that are not objected to or that will elicit very little discussion. I shall, therefore, vote against the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SCOTT. It is proper, perhaps, that I should say that while I am of course desirous for speedy action upon all cases reported from the Committee on Claims, this case is analogous to the case which the President vetoed, the case of J. Milton Best. My recollection is that a veto of this bill was sent in during the last Congress, the President referring to the veto message in the case of Best for the reasons for vetoing this bill.

I make this statement in justice to the Senate, because these cases will necessarily, if the Senate will again go over the ground that was traversed in them before, occupy considerable time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 14, and the noes 17; no quorum voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is satisfied there is a quorum of Senators present, and will put the question again. Senators are requested to vote.

The question being again put, the ayes were 19, and the noes 18.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Cragin, Flanagan, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Morton, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, and Stockton—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Morrill of Vermont, Pratt, Sargent, Sherman, Stewart, Tipton, Windom, and Wright—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Brownlow, Buckingham, Conover, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, and West—33.

So the motion was not agreed to.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 508) for the relief of Andrew Johnson, of Logansport, Indiana, which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Andrew Johnson, of Logansport, Indiana, $409.19, in full discharge of all claims and demands for taxes of all kinds overpaid, or otherwise improperly paid, on any account whatsoever.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask that the report in that case be read, to present to the Senate the exact question that is involved in it.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MERRIMON on the 18th of February:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition, accompanying affidavits, certificates, and other papers of Andrew Johnson, of Logansport, in the State of Indiana, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to report:

The petitioner and one Dantler were distillers under the internal-revenue laws of the United States, in the county of Cass, in said State, at intervals from the 1st day of September, A. D. 1862, until the 23d day of October, A. D. 1866; the petitioner owned the still and fixtures and the land on which the same were situated; the distillery was a small one; the distillers were very simple business men, unaccustomed to accounts and business habits; they inadvertently but honestly failed to report to the proper or any internal-revenue officer, or authority, that they had made and sold, prior to the 1st day of January, A. D. 1865, 215.85 gallons of spirits, but they afterward so reported; the revenue officer insisted that because they made report after the last-mentioned day and date they were liable to pay a tax of two dollars per gallon on account of said spirits, besides the forfeitures imposed by law for such neglect; the petitioner insisted that he was not so bound, but paid such tax and forfeitures under protest, the whole amounting to $409.19.

If the said distillers were liable at all, their liability was technical, and it appears that they were very plain, simple business men, and the committee think they behaved honestly about the matter. They think, therefore, the said sum of money ought to be refunded to the petitioner, he having paid the same. The committee, therefore, report back the accompanying bill, and recommend that the same be passed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say but one word in reference to this case. I did not concur in that report. I understand the case to be put upon this ground, and upon this ground alone: There is no question as to the legal liability of these persons; but they assert that they made no report before the law increasing the tax took effect for the reason that they were not aware of the law, and it is said that they were simple, ignorant persons. There is no question but that under the law they ought to pay this additional tax; but it is said that because they were not aware of the law they should not be thus assessed. That, I think, is the question in a nut-shell.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is there no penalty in this at all?

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly; there is a penalty, too. I say so far as the question that is presented is concerned, if we can relieve these persons, then we can relieve all persons who may violate the law and claim that they were ignorant of the law at the time they violated it.

Mr. PRATT. I am very sorry that my friend from Iowa has felt it necessary to oppose the passage of this bill. This Andrew Johnson is a neighbor of mine. I know him very well; a simple-hearted countryman, who undertook to run a small distillery in the country. He manufactured, as the report shows, some two or three hundred gallons of whisky, but failed to report the fact before the 1st of January, 1865; and in the mean time the revenue tax was raised from fifty cents to two dollars a gallon, and when he came to make his report he was charged with a tax of two dollars a gallon. The poor fellow had sold all his whisky at a good deal less than a dollar a gallon, and he was charged not only the difference in the tax, $1.50 a gallon, but the penalties, &c. He raked and scraped up the money, four hundred and some odd dollars. He is as poor as poverty; and I hope the Senate will take compassion upon him and pass this bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT SMITH MILITARY RESERVATION.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 509) to withhold from sale a portion of the Fort Smith military reservation, in the State of Arkansas, and to prescribe the manner in which the remainder of said reservation shall be sold, and for other purposes; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be laid off a portion of the Fort Smith military reservation in Arkansas, described as follows: Commencing at a point where the southeast side of Wayne street, in the city of Fort Smith, produced westward intersects the southwest side of Garrison avenue; thence along the southeasterly side of Wayne street produced westward one hundred and forty feet; thence in a southerly direction parallel to the line of Garrison avenue to a point of intersection with the boundary line between the city of Fort Smith and the military reservation; thence along that boundary line in a northerly direction to a point where it intersects with the southeasterly side of Wayne street produced westward. And this strip of land is to be laid off into fractional lots, to conform with the general plan of the city of Fort Smith as near as may be; and when so laid off they are to be appraised separately and offered at public sale, at the city of Fort Smith, at such time and in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct; but the persons owning fractional lots in the city of Fort Smith adjoining this strip of land are to have the option of purchasing the fractional lots at the public sale at the appraised value.

The second section proposes to donate all that portion of the Fort Smith military reservation embraced within the limits of Garrison avenue, in the city of Fort Smith, produced to the Arkansas River, as at present laid out and used by the city of Fort Smith, together with the wharf at the foot of Garrison avenue as so produced, to the city of Fort Smith for public use.

The third section directs the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be laid out a suitable road, not less than fifty feet in width, communicating from some public street in the city of Fort Smith to the main entrance of the national cemetery; and he is also to cause Wayne street, in the city of Fort Smith, to be produced westward and laid out to the western boundary of the Fort Smith military reservation in the State of Arkansas; the road and street to be public highways.

By the fourth section all that portion of the Fort Smith military reservation now used for a national cemetery, and that portion of the reservation bounded on the west and northwest by the original boundary of the reservation, and on the northeast by Garrison avenue produced to the Arkansas River, and on the southeast by Wayne street produced to the western boundary of the reservation, together with all the buildings and other improvements thereon, are to be withheld from sale and reserved for the use of the United States.

The fifth section sets apart and reserves the buildings on the reservation now occupied and used by the United States district court for the western district of Arkansas for the future use of the court.

The sixth section directs that the remaining portions of the Fort Smith military reservation shall be subdivided into forty-acre tracts and fractions thereof, in conformity with the public surveys of the United States, and appraised and sold in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of useless military reservations," approved February 24, 1871.

Mr. CLAYTON. Since I reported this bill by the direction of the Committee on Military Affairs information has come to me which I did not then possess, which makes it necessary in order to perfect the bill to make some amendments to it. These amendments do not interfere with the general purposes of the bill, but merely perfect it. I move to amend the second section, in line 5, by inserting after the words "together with" the words "so much of," and in line 6 by striking out the words "as so produced" and inserting "as may be included in said military reservation;" so that the section will read:

That all that portion of said Fort Smith military reservation embraced within the limits of Garrison avenue, in the city of Fort Smith, produced to the Arkansas River, as at present laid out and used by the said city of Fort Smith, together with so much of the wharf at the foot of Garrison avenue as may be included in said military reservation, is hereby donated to the said city of Fort Smith for public use.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. In section 3, line 5, after the word "cemetery," I move to strike out the following words:

And he shall also cause Wayne street, in said city of Fort Smith, to be produced westward and laid out to the western boundary of the Fort Smith military reservation in the State of Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. In section 3, line 8, I move to strike out the words "and street," and in line 9 to strike out the words "public highway" and insert "a public highway."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. In section 4, line 7, before the words "Wayne street" I move to insert the words "the south side of."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORT OF SAN PEDRO, CALIFORNIA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 237) to change the name of the port of San Pedro, California, to Wilmington; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SARAH F. LINCOLN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 517) for the relief of Sarah F. Lincoln, postmaster at Spencerport, Monroe County, New York; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit Sarah F. Lincoln, in her account as postmaster, with the sum of $516.20, being the amount of postage-stamps stolen from the safe of the post-office by burglars on the night of the 3d of January, 1873, without fault or negligence on the part of the postmaster.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE W. KEYES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1222) for the relief of George W. Keyes; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit George W. Keyes, postmaster at Olivet, Michigan, in his account as such postmaster, with the sum of $106.50, being the amount of postage-stamps burglariously stolen from the safe where the stamps were deposited, on the night of the 5th of May, 1869, without fault or negligence on the part of the postmaster.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF NAME OF SCHOONER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 406) to allow the schooner Ocean Wave to take the name of Edith E. Wright, and be registered under that name; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN RESERVATION IN MONTANA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1922) to establish a reservation for certain Indians in the Territory of Montana; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to set apart the following-described tract of country in the Territory of Montana for the use and occupation of the Gros Ventre, Piegan, Blood, Blackfoot, River Crow, and such other Indians as the President may, from time to time, see fit to locate thereon, namely: Commencing at the northwest corner of the Territory of Dakota, being the intersection of the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude and the one hundred and fourth meridian of west longitude; thence south to the south bank of the Missouri River; thence up and along the south bank of said river to a point opposite the mouth of the Maria's River; thence along the main channel of the Maria's River to Birch Creek; thence up the main channel of Birch Creek to its source; thence west to the summit of the main chain of the Rocky Mountains; thence along the summit of the Rocky Mountains to the northern boundary of Montana; thence along said northern boundary to the place of beginning.

Mr. BOGY. This bill is reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs. The subject has been examined by the committee. The establishment of this reservation is an absolute necessity, and the bill ought to pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 170) for the relief of certain officers of the Navy who were dropped, furloughed, or retired under the act of February 28, 1855; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides that all officers now in the Navy, and the widows or heirs of those who have died while attached to the Navy, who were dropped, furloughed, or retired under the act of February 28, 1855, and who were afterward promoted and restored to the active list of the Navy, under the operations of the act of January 16, 1857, or by the President under the operation of subsequent laws, shall be entitled to receive the difference between the pay respectively received by them and the pay at that time designated by law for officers on the active list of the rank to which they were respectively promoted, for and during the time they were affected by the operation of the acts of February 28, 1855, and January 16, 1857.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the reading of the report in that case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. ANTHONY at the third session of the Forty-second Congress, (February 20, 1873:)

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred petitions of several officers of the Navy, praying a modification of the act of January 16, 1857, that they may receive the pay of their actual rank, have had the same under consideration, and report as follows:

The petitioners, officers in the United States Navy, were, by the action of a board of naval officers, constituted under the act of February 28, 1855, placed on the retired list, furloughed, or dropped.

That in accordance with the act of January 16, 1857, and the joint resolution of March, 10, 1858, authorizing the President to restore certain officers to the active list where the records of the courts of inquiry "may render it advisable," these officers were placed on the active list, and were also promoted to date from the day they were placed on the retired list, furloughed, or dropped, by the naval board.

The sixth section of the act of January 16, 1857, provides "that all officers who may be restored to active service under the provisions of this act shall be entitled to draw the same pay they were drawing at the time they were retired or dropped, for and during the time of such retirement or suspension from the active service aforesaid."

By the construction given to this section by the accounting officers, these claimants only received the pay to which they were entitled at the time of their retirement, although their commissions on reinstatement to the active list gave them an advanced rank, to date from the time they were retired.

This act and the resolution of March 10, 1868, authorized the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to restore these officers to the position and rank in the Navy which they would have held had they not been retired, furloughed, or dropped, on the report of the naval board or court of inquiry, but by the interpretation of the sixth section above quoted, they were not allowed and have never received the pay of the rank they held upon restoration to the active list.

The committee have not deemed it necessary to inquire into the justice or injustice done by this naval board, for if a wrong was perpetrated on the officers who were ordered before it for examination, the President, in the exercise of his powers, reviewed the action and corrected the errors, in restoring these officers with the advice and consent of the Senate; and at the same time promoted them to the positions they would have held respectively, had it not been for the recommendations of the court of inquiry.

The committee have given this matter a most careful examination, and can see no good reason why an officer in either branch of our service should not receive the pay of his proper rank, withheld from the petitioners as before stated, and therefore report the accompanying bill and ask its passage.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to move an amendment to the bill. In line 4, after the word "Navy," I move to insert the words "including the widow of Captain Elisha Peck, relieved by special act of March 3, 1873." This is merely to bring this case within the same rule as those that were relieved under the general law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In line 10, after the words "shall be entitled to receive," I move to insert the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated." This is an amendment that the Comptroller thought proper. It is the usual form, I believe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONTRACTORS FOR WAR VESSELS AND STEAM MACHINERY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 141) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to refer the claims for building vessels of war and constructing steam machinery, referred to and embraced in the act entitled "An act for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery," approved March 2, 1867, to the Court of Claims, which is vested with authority and jurisdiction to hear and determine the respective claims of the several parties, upon the principles and rules laid down in that act. All such claims are to be presented to the court within one year after the passage of this act, not afterward. Any sums heretofore allowed to any of the claimants as additional compensation are to be deducted from any amount which may be found due to such claimants respectively.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. CRAGIN on the 20th of February:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 141) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

This bill proposes to allow certain contractors, who claim that they have sustained damage and suffered loss in the execution of their contracts in the building of vessels of war and the construction of steam machinery, to prove their claims in the Court of Claims, giving said court the authority and jurisdiction to hear and determine the individual cases upon the principles and rules laid down in the act of March 2, 1867.

These contracts were made with the Government during the years 1861, 1862, 1863, and 1864, and many of them before the war had produced any great advance in the prices of labor and materials, and when it was impossible to foresee its long continuance or its effect in the increasing of prices.

By the terms of the contracts the Government was required and bound to furnish plans and drawings as fast as required by the contractors during the progress of the work; and in many cases the officers of the Government failed in this regard, and in consequence thereof the work was suspended for longer or shorter periods of time. The building of these vessels was in a degree experimental, and the Navy Department in many instances ordered material and important alterations in the plans and specifications during the course of construction, which also caused delays in the fulfillment of the contracts. By reason of the delays thus caused by the omissions and action of the Government the contractors were delayed in many cases; and that they incurred great loss and hardship by reason of the advance in prices of labor and material, which was an incident to the delay directly occasioned by the action of the Government, your committee have no doubt.

The fact that these parties went on and fulfilled their contracts after it became apparent that to do so would involve them in loss, relying upon the justice and generosity of the Government to save them from financial ruin in completing vessels which were indispensable in prosecuting the war to a successful termination, is certainly laudable on their part, and worthy of commendation and the careful consideration of Congress. Although the Navy Department undertook to pay for extra labor and materials which entered into these alterations, the amount allowed in many cases is alleged insufficient to make good the loss of claimants, as allowances were only made for specific changes; and the damage to the contractors by reason of the delays occasioned by the Government and the advance in prices of labor and material was not considered. And while your committee do not express any opinion as to the sufficiency of awards made by the Department, (for this could only be ascertained by a full investigation of each case,) they can see no good reason or valid objection why these questions, which are eminently judicial, involving disputed facts and controverted questions of law, should not be referred to that tribunal of the Government created for the determination of cases of this very character; one that is familiar with all the laws and rules relating to Government transactions and contracts, possessing all the appliances for a full, complete, and just trial of all questions of law and fact, and its decision, whether for or against the Government, subject to revision by the Supreme Court. During the third session of the Forty-first Congress the joint resolution, No. 92, "for the relief of constructors of vessels of war and steam machinery," was passed, which gave the court the jurisdiction now contemplated by this bill; but the President vetoed it, upon the ground that there was no provision that the extraordinary advances could not have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary diligence and prudence on the part of the contractors; and that omission is now supplied, thus meeting the objection raised at that time and carefully guarding the Government against the payment a second time of any moneys already paid to the contractors by reason of these extraordinary outlays. In the act of March 2, 1867, Congress evidently intended that these contractors should be compensated—

First. For all the costs and expenses of the changes and alterations made during the progress of the work not required by the original contract.

Secondly. For the rise in material and labor used in and employed on said vessels, occasioned by the delay required to make such changes, at the order and direction of the Government, unless such increased costs could have been avoided by ordinary prudence and diligence on the part of the contractors.

Your committee think that these cases should all be investigated by the courts, and in this way justice will be done to both Government and claimants. The proposed relief is contingent upon the positive proof of claimants' allegations to the Court of Claims. Parties must show themselves within the law, and their evidence must be satisfactory on the questions at issue in order to entitle them to recover.

If they have been wronged, then will they have an ample remedy in the law which the bill proposes to enact; and if the Government by its action did not occasion them any hardship or loss, further than stipulated by the express terms of the contracts, it will be fully protected by the learned officers of a tribunal of its own creation. The investigation of these cases involves the examination of questions of law and fact which the Court of Claims can with most propriety hear and determine.

The right to relief by this class of claimants has several times been recognized by the Navy Department and by Congress; by the Department, in paying to most of the contractors sums of money over and above the contract price for extra labor and materials, and by Congress in the Senate resolution and the act of March 2, before cited; also in the passage of a bill for the relief of the heirs of George Bester, (vide Statutes at Large, volume 17, page 733,) and again in the act of March 3, 1873, granting the same relief to Miles Greenwood that is now proposed for those who assumed like responsibilities and sustained losses for like reasons.

The committee report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not know but that there may be some equity in having this matter submitted to the Court of Claims; but I should like to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that reports this bill, whether this bill does not authorize the readjudication of claims that have been passed upon by the Department, and also passed upon by a commission; and whether supplementary allowances have not already been made in a large number of these cases.

Mr. CRAGIN. The subject-matter of this bill has been before the Committee on Naval Affairs ever since I have been a member of it, now nine years and more, and that committee have never failed to report in favor of these claimants. This particular bill refers the claimants to the Court of Claims under the statute of 1867, which provided for the organization of a board of naval officers to examine these claims; and in that law there are certain rules which are to govern the court. They are not authorized, in my judgment, to re-examine the whole case, but they are directed to proceed in a particular manner. Of course these contractors have received their contract price, and have, most of them or all of them, received certain allowances for extra materials and labor; but none of them have received any allowance in the way of damages for the losses occasioned by the delays and alterations caused by the Government. The main object of sending these contractors to the Court of Claims is that that court may examine into the whole question and see where they were damaged by delays and changes of plans. Many of them were delayed six months, and some a year, in consequence of the changes in the plans made by the Government. Of course, in the mean time labor increased in price and materials increased in price, and the contractors were otherwise damaged by having their employés thrown out of employment, and they were obliged, at the end of six months, when the new plans and specifications were furnished, to hire men again at largely increased prices.

This bill is precisely, word for word, like the bill we passed at the last session in favor of Miles Greenwood, one of these contractors. That case has gone to the Court of Claims. This is a general bill embracing all these contractors, and the bill provides that if the court shall find anything due to these contractors it shall deduct all that they have received in the way of extra allowances or compensation, so that they are all put upon an equality. This application is very meritorious. Many of these contractors have lost thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars, and will lose if this bill shall pass and the Court of Claims shall act upon the cases favorably to the extent of the authority the law confers. If the court goes that far under this bill, it will still do only partial equity; it will give to these contractors the actual additional cost of their labor and materials caused by the delays and by the orders of the Government, by the changes in the specifications and plans made by the Department during the progress of the work. For instance, a contractor took a contract to build his vessel and have it completed in six months; but in consequence of the action of the Government he was delayed eighteen months before he could complete his vessel. I know from many personal examinations of these claims that they are just and meritorious; and the way this bill is guarded, by stating the principles upon which the reference to the Court of Claims is based, is entirely favorable to the Government. These contractors must go there and make out their case; they must show that they used due diligence; they must show that they were prepared to do this work, and that they were damaged in consequence of delays or changes of plans on the part of the Government. If there was a contractor who had no facilities for performing the work which he had undertaken, who had not provided himself with materials and labor, and the delay caused by the action of the Government was no damage to him, then he will not get anything under this bill; but if he was prepared to go forward, if he was going forward, and was delayed for one month, six months, or more, in consequence of the failure on the part of the Government to furnish its plans or specifications, or of changes made by it, then he will be entitled to receive under this bill what those changes actually cost him. Alterations were made by order of the Government upon vessels which involved a cost of two or three hundred thousand dollars. After a vessel had been to sea, had been in action, and its defects were ascertained, then the Department went to work to remedy those defects; they said to the contractors at work on similar vessels, "Stop right where you are; we have alterations and changes to make;" and they did stop, stopped many months some of them; and this bill is simply to give them their actual loss in consequence of this action and delay of the Government, and nothing more. It does not give them anything for the increased prices of labor or materials caused by the condition of the country, the increase of the currency, and so on. They took all those risks, all those chances; but it does give them damages for the actual delays caused by the action of the Government, and nothing more. As a bill passed at last session sending one contractor, Miles Greenwood, to the Court of Claims, I hope this bill will pass, which covers all these cases.

Mr. OGLESBY. May I ask the honorable Senator a question?

Mr. CRAGIN. Certainly.

Mr. OGLESBY. I have made inquiries of several Senators near me and have been unable to ascertain a little bit of information that would be very desirable. If this bill shall pass, and these numerous claims shall be referred to the Court of Claims, I understand that evidence will be presented there of damages to these contractors in regard to the various ships on which they will claim damages. What officers of the Government are there at the Court of Claims to resist that evidence or to hunt up counter-proof or to meet these claimants before the Court of Claims?

Mr. CRAGIN. The Attorney-General and the force under him.

Mr. OGLESBY. Under the orders of the Court of Claims?

Mr. CRAGIN. Certainly.

Mr. OGLESBY. And they will have perfect liberty to produce counter-evidence if the cases go before that court?

Mr. CRAGIN. Undoubtedly. One of the Assistant Attorneys-General is specially assigned for that purpose. There is one case in the court already which the Government is contesting, and if these cases go there the same course will be taken.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether this bill does anything more than simply to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear and determine the merits of these claims?

Mr. CRAGIN. Yes, on the principles of the act of March 2, 1867.

Mr. PRATT. What were those principles?

Mr. CRAGIN. I will read that, if the Senator from Vermont who has it before him will hand it to me.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I was about to present that act. I have no disposition to resist any just claim against the Government of the United States, but these are claims ten or a dozen years old, and, of course, any rebutting proof on the part of the Government must be very difficult to obtain. There was a law placed on the statute-book in 1867 which gave the Secretary of the Navy authority to investigate all these claims of contractors for identically the same grievances that now the Committee on Naval Affairs report shall be reinvestigated and readjudicated by the Court of Claims. If these claims have been once before the Secretary of the Navy and these points all considered, I cannot, I confess, see any propriety in referring them again to the Court of Claims.

Now, the act of March 2, 1867, specially authorized the Secretary of the Navy—

To investigate the claims of all contractors for building vessels of war and steam machinery for the same under contracts made after the 1st day of May, 1861, and prior to the 1st day of January, 1864. * * But no allowance for any advance in the price of labor or material shall be considered.

He was, however, to allow any additional cost which was necessarily incurred by each contractor in the completion of his work by reason of any changes or alterations of the plan and of the specifications required and delays in the prosecution of the work occasioned by the Government which were not provided for in the original contract. Now I beg to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs why is it that these claims are here again if they have been once considered, adjusted, and paid by the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. CRAGIN. Nothing was paid by the Secretary of the Navy. The whole matter was referred back to Congress again. That board simply made its report to Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did nobody take any pay under it?

Mr. CRAGIN. There were five or six awards, I think, by the action of that board, and Congress passed an act paying those five or six persons.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Paying according to the allowance made by the Secretary?

Mr. CRAGIN. The Secretary had nothing to do with it. They were made by the board.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. A board appointed by him.

Mr. CRAGIN. That is true.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then do I understand that all these claims are going before the Court of Claims again?

Mr. CRAGIN. The same claims.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Although they have accepted and received in full the amount that was allowed, they are to go before the court again, as well those that have been paid as those that have not?

Mr. CRAGIN. I did not expect this bill would come up to-day. I have many papers on the subject in my committee-room that are not at hand now; but I can state generally that this board construed the act of 1867 in so restricted a manner that very few of the claimants were before them at all. They held their sessions here at the Navy Department, and for a short time took the records there. The claimants did not come before them with their evidence, and they ruled out as a rule all those parties who did not get their vessels done before the close of the war, no matter for what reason; and they put such a construction upon this statute that many of the meritorious cases were not actually considered at all. They reported that some five or six were entitled to a certain sum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this is an old subject. It has been investigated by the Navy Department more than once, and I think as to some of the claims which will fall under this bill, general as it is, you will find that there were some reports made under the statutes as they now exist to the Navy Department about one of these claims in particular that I have in my mind not altogether favorable in its nature, and which, if the Committee on Naval Affairs should have the advantage of seeing, I think would lead them to be extremely cautious (as perhaps they have been now) in allowing that claimant to reopen the subject in the Court of Claims. I think, therefore, that the wise thing to do is to allow this matter to go over until a future day, when we can get at these papers in the Navy Department, some of which I have seen about one claim, and in respect to which I should be sorry to have any Senator vote without knowing them. Very much has been done for the gentleman who has that claim; how much legislation has been had at his special instance and request as he wanted it, to all appearances, I do not know; but when he found out what was going to be the result about it, he suddenly became dissatisfied with that kind of legislation, if I am rightly informed. I do not wish to prejudge anything, and so I do not name the case; but I have had information of that character.

As my colleague says, we ought to be extremely careful after so great a lapse of time, after having provided for a reinvestigation of these contracts by a board of officers under the Navy Department, and after the most of these claimants submitted their claims to that reinvestigation and they have been passed upon, the most of these claimants having received money under the award and having signed acquittances.

Mr. CRAGIN. Not one in ten.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then would it not be worth while to know who these claimants are, name by name, if their name is legion and we have been all these years in getting them through the Navy Department by this repeated legislation which is referred to, and their name is still so great that we do not know the situation? We do not yet know in any bill, it seems, who they are, how much their claims are, what vessels they built, why they were not settled with at the time. In this state of affairs ought we not to consider a little before we open the Court of Claims to them, when the defensive evidence is largely gone and when the asserting evidence is always preserved in the hands of the claimant by his affidavits and otherwise? We ought to be extremely cautious. Of course my friend from New Hampshire intends to be extremely cautious; perhaps he has been; but I do say the subject is so important that we ought not to act without the fullest information of the number of these people, and what has been the history of each man in his efforts to get what he considers to be justice, what he has proposed to do, and what has been done under the legislation that has been given in his behalf. If these were contracts to build ships, and the Court of Claims has always had jurisdiction of contracts, why is it that these contractors have not sued in the Court of Claims at the proper time? You do not need an act of Congress to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to try a claim under a contract for building a vessel of war for the United States. The Court of Claims has always had that jurisdiction. It has jurisdiction of all claims under contracts against the United States. That is not the matter. There is something else about it; and that something else led to the passage of the act of 1867, which provided for another tribunal, one that was satisfactory as I must suppose to these claimants, for certainly it was not volunteer legislation on the part of Congress; it was legislation brought about under the pressure of individual application; and it took place; and something happened in the Department in respect to some or all of these claims under the authority of that law.

Now, I pronounce no opinion upon the merits of these cases; I have only intimated a difficulty with one of them that I happen to have heard about; but ought we not to know with precision what is the definite and precise nature of every step that we are to take in respect to these claimants, what has been done in each case, how much money has been paid, what are the specific points upon which it is said these claimants have not yet each of them been paid, what he demands or expects? Besides, each one again submitted himself to the jurisdiction of a new tribunal, a board of officers; they acted upon these cases. If so, we ought to know how they acted, and upon what grounds their award, if any was made, has been paid, or has the claimant refused to receive payment. If it has been paid, has he in consideration of taking that amount of money signed a complete release to the United States? Do we know any of these facts? The chairman says he has not now his papers. I do not complain of that for the reason that my friend says the bill has come up unexpectedly.

Mr. CRAGIN. The case is stated pretty fully in the report which has been read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was here when this case came up on the report of the committee as it was printed. I had not the pleasure of listening to the speech of my honorable friend. I was necessarily absent at the time; but I take not the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire, as good as I have no doubt it was, but I take the authoritative report of the body of this body to whom the subject was committed; and I find that that report, which, as the parliamentary phrase is, I hold in my hand, I must be permitted to say is not altogether specific in respect to the points to which I have alluded. In fact I cannot find in this report an answer to one of the questions which I have suggested as being those which it would be our duty to be informed upon. It is a general sweeping statement, without naming persons or places, that these various contracts without name were made in 1861, 1862, 1863, and 1864. Then it states in general what were the terms of those contracts, and then it proceeds to state that the committee express no opinion on the merits of these claims. It does not undertake to say what was done upon them under the act of 1867, or upon any of them, in the Navy Department. It does not undertake to say whether the claim of A, if there be such a claimant, was considered by the new board or what were the reasons why it was not considered; but it finally says that the best way to get rid of the thing is to send them all to the Court of Claims, that has legal jurisdiction and legal competence to hear proofs, and there you can get justice. Undoubtedly you can, Mr. President, get justice in every court if you apply in season; but if you wait until the time of the statute of limitations has run on over and over again, and then get authority to bring a claim against the United States under the jurisdiction of that court, where do you leave the people who pay the taxes; where do you leave the evidence which, if the claim had been asserted in court in the time of it, might have been secured in a legal way which might mitigate or defeat entirely the claim which may be made? You cannot get it at all. Death, the operations of nature and of business, and emigration scatter men away, and you cannot bring back again the full force of the facts as they existed at the time.

These are to me serious considerations why we ought to exercise the utmost caution in reviving for a retrial claims which have grown to be stale, and which, instead of having been presented to a tribunal that had jurisdiction in the time when the facts were fresh and the witnesses were forthcoming, are suffered to hang along in the legislative department or are suffered by the consent of the parties to go before a board who either have or ought to have disposed of them, and are again brought forward at a late day for a consideration which cannot, as it respects the people who are to foot the bill, be a just and impartial one. I say this in general, and I only say it for the purpose now of asking (because I may vote for this bill myself) that it shall lie over until we can make a more critical inquiry into the nature of it. I see that the committee suggest that there is a precedent for this bill in the act for the relief of Miles Greenwood, passed on the 3d of March, 1873. That is a mistake. This bill is not at all like the Miles Greenwood bill. The Miles Greenwood bill, which I now have before me, provided in specific terms the principles upon which, and the rules by which, and the limitations under which, Miles Greenwood, one of the naval contractor claimants, should be authorized to go before the Court of Claims at all. It was not upon the principles of the act of 1867. They were thought to be too broad and too loose, after so great a lapse of time, even for him. Therefore the Committee on Naval Affairs thought it necessary, and with wise forethought I think, to make a special bill for Miles Greenwood and to state in precise and narrower terms than the act of 1867 provided, the principles on which he should be allowed to go there.

I have only said this, Mr. President, not by way of opposition to these claims, but by the way of asking for a temporary and reasonable delay until I can look at the papers in the particular matter that I had in my mind at the Navy Department, to refresh myself, and until Senators can be better informed on the subject. I move, therefore, if my friend will allow me——

Mr. CRAGIN. I want to make a statement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to postpone the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. CRAGIN. I stated in the outset that the subject-matter of this bill had been before the Naval Committee for nine years at least, ever since I have been a member of the Senate, and that that committee had uniformly reported favorably in these cases.

In 1866 the matter was before the Naval Committee and was referred to a sub-committee, consisting of Senator Hendricks of Indiana, Senator Willey of West Virginia, and Senator Nye of Nevada. Prior to that the Senate of the United States, in the executive called session at the spring of 1865, passed a resolution requesting the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a board of officers to examine into these claims. He did appoint a board of officers, who held their sessions in the city of New York and in other cities for over eight months, making a thorough examination into each individual claim embraced in these contracts for vessels of war and steam machinery; and they made their report to the Secretary of the Navy. That report was sent to Congress. By that report that board found due to these naval contractors over $2,000,000 to cover the entire cost of their work. That report was referred to the sub-committee that I mentioned in 1866; and the Committee on Naval Affairs then reported a bill in conformity with the report of the board, paying to each contractor the exact sum found by the board, which, as I said before, amounted to about $2,000,000 in the aggregate. The subject was discussed in the Senate for several days, when Mr. Grimes, chairman of the committee, moved as a substitute for the bill then pending that each contractor be allowed 12 per cent. upon the contract price, which amendment prevailed and the bill passed in that shape. After having passed the Senate in that shape, it went to the House of Representatives; but instead of acting on the bill there they passed the act of 1867 which is referred to in this bill. It was not passed at the request of these contractors at all; it was offered in the House as an amendment to the Senate bill, went back to the Senate, and was finally concurred in here. Under that act the Secretary of the Navy appointed the last board, known as the Marchant board; the first board was known as the Selfridge board. The Marchant board, under instructions of the Secretary of the Navy, confined their action to very narrow limits; they construed the act as not authorizing them to go into the investigation of the entire case at all, and therefore they took simply such records as they had at the Navy Department, not notifying the contractors in many cases, if in any, to come before them, and they made up their minds upon such instructions as they received, and such construction as they gave to this act.

The Senator from Vermont refers to some individual case. I do not know to whom he refers or to what he refers. I am not disposed to press the bill to final action to-day, for I confess I am not prepared to meet all the questions that might arise in regard to it here. The Naval Committee understand all that these two boards have done. They understand what the Navy Department has done in these matters. The Navy Department has paid the contract price for these vessels and machinery; it has undertaken to pay for some of the extra work and materials which were occasioned by the changes and alterations made by the Department; but it has not paid in full. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that many of these cases are precisely like one which I will now put to him. If he should draw up a contract to build a house under a certain plan and specifications, and the contractor should sign it, and afterward he should decide to enlarge that house and to make changes and alterations that might amount to a sum equal to the original cost as contemplated by the contract and specifications, he would have a case precisely parallel to many of the cases embraced in this bill. I know that if the Senator had so varied his contract in the case of building a house—if he had asked the contractor to add fifty feet in length and twenty feet in width and a story more to his house not contemplated in the original specifications—he would not expect him to build it according to the price adapted to the specifications and contract as first entered into.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should not have been able to pay in such a case. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAGIN. In this case vessels were contracted to be built in three months' time for $500,000 say; and by the order of the Department making changes, ordering delays and additions, the contractors were eighteen months in building them; and the alterations and additions cost more in some cases than the original contract price. What this bill seeks to do is to give a remedy to these parties for the delay which the Government caused by its own action by changing the plans, by adding new material, increasing the thickness of the iron plates, telling them where they had put on plates three inches thick to tear them off and put on plates five or six inches thick, and so on. I have before me here now, but I will not take time to read them, the letters in some cases directing these changes to be made.

But, Mr. President, as it seems on all hands desirable that this matter should go over until to-morrow, I will give way now for the Senator from Vermont or some other Senator to make a motion to postpone.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have made that motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, a year ago, when this matter was before the Senate, I had my attention drawn particularly to it. I gave to it what I thought a very careful attention; and from that investigation I can only state now generally that there are equities in these cases which I think will address themselves to the judgment of every Senator who will investigate the subject; but at this length of time I am not myself willing to state the case precisely as I then understood it, and as I now understand it, without refreshing my recollection from a reinvestigation of the matter. I therefore submit the motion that this bill be passed over informally so that it will not lose its place on the Calendar, but may be taken up at any time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall not make any opposition to this being taken up after a reasonable time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SCOTT in the chair.) The Senator from Maine suggests that the bill be informally passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. CONKLING. Does that leave it the unfinished business?

Mr. HAMLIN. No.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will make a formal motion to postpone the bill until to-morrow, saying to the gentleman in charge of it that I shall have no opposition to taking up the bill after a little time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2124) authorizing the changing of the name of the steamer Fanny Lehr;

A bill (H. R. No. 2866) relieving the legal and political disabilities of Fitzhugh Lee;

A bill (H. R. No. 2867) to authorize the use of certain unexpended balances in the United States Treasury;

A bill (H. R. No. 2868) to render available an unexpended balance of appropriation for collection and payment for bounty, &c., for colored soldiers and sailors; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2716) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary C. Reno.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 241) to confirm the title to certain lands on the Fort Kearney military reservation in Fremont County, Iowa; and

A bill (S. No. 254) to donate the military reservation at Fort Steilacoom to the Territory of Washington for the use of the insane asylum.

GEORGE A. ARMES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 249) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to give to George A. Armes, late Captain Tenth United States Cavalry, an honorable discharge, to date the 7th day of June, 1870; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a printed report?

Mr. CLAYTON. There is.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to hear it read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. CLAYTON on February 20:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 249) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to give to George A. Armes, late captain Tenth United States Cavalry, an honorable discharge, to date June 7, 1870, having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report:

It appears that the charges preferred against Captain Armes were four in number. Upon the first a nolle prosequi was entered; upon the third and fourth he was found not guilty; and upon the second charge, "conduct unbecoming an officer and gentleman," he was found guilty, and sentenced to be dismissed the service. These charges were preferred by Captain George W. Graham, against whom Captain Armes had previously preferred charges, upon which Graham was afterward tried, found guilty, and sentenced to be dismissed the service, fined and imprisoned in a penitentiary, and he is now in the penitentiary for highway robbery. It also appears that a considerable portion of the important testimony which was relied on was given by Captain Charles G. Cox, against whom Captain Armes had previously preferred charges, upon which, within two months thereafter, he (Cox) was dismissed the service, cashiered, and sentenced to be fined, and imprisoned in a penitentiary. His evidence was contradicted point-blank by another witness, and a portion of his testimony is conclusively shown to have been false.

There is nothing in the record, so far as can be judged from a careful examination thereof, that, according to military usage, justifies the sentence that was imposed by the court-martial.

Your committee are well satisfied that the charges were preferred through motives of jealousy and revenge, and the proceedings show that there was a determination on the part of those officers who instigated the prosecution to have Armes dismissed at any cost.

It has been shown beyond a doubt that Captain Armes was a brave and gallant officer. He was mentioned in general orders by General Philip Saint George Cooke, United States Army, and congratulated by letter by Major-General Winfield S. Hancock, recommended for promotion for energy and gallant and meritorious conduct on several occasions, both during the rebellion and in campaigns against the Indians, and was promoted captain from a second lieutenant, and made a major by brevet.

General C. C. Augur, General Nelson A. Miles, General N. B. Buford, General B. H. Grierson, and a number of other Army officers, bear testimony to the high character and efficiency of Captain Armes.

Numerous statements from responsible and well-known citizens also show that Captain Armes was considered an upright and honorable man by those who have known him longest and best.

Your committee report back the bill without amendment, and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does that bill appropriate money for pay?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands there is pay involved in it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read again.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to give to George A. Armes, late captain Tenth United States Cavalry and brevet major United States Army, an honorable discharge from the service of the United States, to date June 7, 1870; and that said George A. Armes be paid the same pay and allowances as if he had been discharged under the provisions of the third section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1871, and for other purposes," approved July 15, 1870.

Mr. SHERMAN. The title ought to be changed to show what it is.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

J. MILTON BEST.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 519) for the relief of J. Milton Best.

Mr. BOREMAN. That is one of the same class of cases about which we had some discussion this morning on the Wallace bill. I apprehend they had better be discussed together. I believe this is a bill that the President vetoed heretofore. I think it had better go over, and let the whole discussion come up together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia objects to the present consideration of the bill. It will be passed over, and the Secretary will report the next bill on the Calendar.

WILLIAM STODDARD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 154) for the relief of William Stoddard, late assistant quartermaster United States volunteers, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William Stoddard, late assistant quartermaster United States volunteers, $360, that sum being the amount of private funds belonging to Stoddard which was seized by military authority and afterward covered into the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANK M. KELLY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1932) for the relief of Frank M. Kelly, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. By its terms the Paymaster-General of the Army is directed to pay to Frank M. Kelly, a private in Company F, First Regiment United States Cavalry, $30.39, that amount being the value of certain articles of uniform clothing purchased by him to replace a like number of articles consumed in the fire which destroyed one of the buildings at Camp Warner, Oregon, on the 27th day of January, 1873.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VICTOR MYLIUS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1405) for the relief of Victor Mylius, of Macoupin County, Illinois, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Victor Mylius, late sergeant in the Sixty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers, the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of infantry, from the 17th of April to the 16th of May, 1863, and the pay and allowances of a first lieutenant of infantry thereafter to the 6th day of June, 1865, less the amount received by him as a sergeant for the period named.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETH LAMB.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1585) for the relief of the heirs of Seth Lamb, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to Theodore L. Lamb, Mary M. Muldan, and Philena Kingsley of $490, in full of the claim of Seth Lamb, deceased, for boarding and quartering Captain Mott's Howitzer Corps, Second Regiment New York State Militia, from the 21st of May to the 1st of June, 1861.

Mr. HOWE. Is there a report accompanying that bill? If there is I wish to hear it.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. LOGAN on February 24:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill H. R. No. 1585, having had the same under consideration, would report as follows:

That Seth Lamb, the father of the claimants, at the commencement of the late war was proprietor of Saint Charles Hotel, Washington City; that he boarded and quartered Captain Mott's Howitzer Corps, Second Regiment New York State Militia, from May 21 to June 1, 1861, for which he charged the sum of $490, the sum now claimed.

The evidence in this case consists, in addition to that of the claimants, of the affidavit of Judge Underwood, which is positive and specific, covering the whole case; also the account of Seth Lamb, with the indorsement of the proper officers; proof that said company was then in the employ of the United States, defending the city; also evidence from the War and Treasury Departments, showing that said claim has not been paid.

The evidence being conclusive as to the liability of the Government, we therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TERRITORIAL JUDGES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1393) providing for the assignment of judges in the Territories, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the Legislature of each of the organized Territories of the United States (except the Territory of Utah) shall, at each regular session thereof, make an assignment of the judges to hold the courts in the several districts in such Territory; but if the Legislature of either of such Territories shall have failed, or shall hereafter fail, to make such assignment, the judges shall make an assignment, which shall continue in force until the close of the next regular session of the Legislature.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported an amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the judges of the supreme court of the respective Territories, except Utah, or a majority of them, shall, at the first regular or adjourned term of said supreme court after the passage and approval of this act, and annually thereafter, if expedient, fix the boundaries of the respective districts, and appoint the times and places of holding courts therein, and designate the judges respectively who shall hold the same: Provided, That in case of a failure in any of the said Territories so to fix the districts and make such assignments, the Legislature of said Territory shall fix said districts and make such assignment, to continue till the judges, or a majority of them, shall change the same.

Mr. BOREMAN. As far as I am advised on this subject I think the House bill is to be preferred to the amendment of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. I do not know, of course, what was before the Judiciary Committee here that induced them to submit the amendment. Having been upon the Committee on Territories for some years, I have become somewhat familiar with the difficulties that arise in regard to judges and various other officers in the Territories, and it has been made manifest that the best of feeling does not always prevail among the judges. It seems to me that if this amendment, suggested by the Committee on the Judiciary, shall be adopted, we shall put the judiciary of the various Territories into a position to be in a constant quarrel.

It will be seen that the House bill authorizes the Legislatures of the several Territories, except Utah, to assign the judges at each session of the Legislature, which is once in two years. That is probably for the purpose of taking a judge who has had a hard district for two years and giving him an easier berth for a time, and so on, changing them around. It is thought just for them to do so that one man may not have a hard berth all the time. Now it occurs sometimes, I have been informed, that two of the judges in a Territory will combine and do injustice to the third. Sometimes under the organic law this matter is left to the governor of the Territory in the first instance, and, so far as I have examined the question, thereafter the Legislature of the Territory has invariably been allowed to fix the boundaries of the judicial districts, and to assign the judges, and I think that is the better course.

As I remarked, I do not know what moved the Judiciary Committee to propose this amendment. My experience upon the Committee on Territories would lead me to support the original bill unless the Committee on the Judiciary have some good reason for pressing this substitute. As I remarked, bad feeling sometimes exists and two of the judges may combine against the third. They cannot very well influence the Legislature to do that sort of injustice so as to banish one man into a remote part of the Territory and keep him there during his term. The Legislature, it seems to me, is the proper branch of the Government to do this thing. It is so in the States; there, where the constitutions do not fix the judicial districts, the Legislatures select them, and I apprehend that according to the constitutions of most of the States, where the districts are to be fixed thereafter, where there is to be a rearrangement of districts, it is provided that it shall be done by the Legislature. I cannot see why in a Territory the Legislature should not take jurisdiction and attend to this matter as well as in a State, and not leave it to the judges to be a subject of discussion and of injustice and wrangle from time to time, as I think it will be under this bill if amended as proposed.

I will state further that my attention has been called to this by some of the representatives from the Territories, not all of them, but some of them, and they prefer the House bill. They think it is better for the harmony of the Territories, better for the fair administration of justice, better for the equality of the labor of the judges in the Territories. They have spoken to me and asked me to make these suggestions to the Senate, and to say that they prefer the original bill as it came from the House to this substitute. I have thought it my duty, being a member of the Committee on Territories, to make these statements to the Senate for their consideration.

Mr. WRIGHT. Having reported this bill from the Judiciary Committee, I will state as briefly as may be the reason that influenced us in making this change. As I understand, by the laws of some of the Territories the assignment of the judges is left to the governor, and then by the laws of some of the Territories left to the Legislature, and then by others left to the judges themselves; and not a little confusion and difficulty have thus originated, and a question was made which was the preferable way. It was deemed advisable to settle it by some congressional action. The House bill provided that in the first instance the assignment of the judges and the arrangement of districts should be left to the Legislature, and if the Legislature failed to act, then the judges should act upon the matter and dispose of the districts and the assignment of judges.

The question before the committee was whether it were better that the judges should dispose of this matter in the first instance, and if they failed to make the arrangement leave it then to the Legislature, or whether the Legislature should first do it, and if the Legislature failed, then submit it to the judges; and in looking the whole ground over, anxious to have as much harmony and quiet and as little difficulty in the Territories as possible touching this matter of judicial districts, the committee concluded that it were better to leave it to the judges in the first instance. This is as a rule for all the Territories. While it may be that in some of the Territories the Legislature could arrange it better, and with but little if any difficulty, it has been found that in some of them there has been difficulty and great injustice done to the judges in that respect.

In view of the esprit de corps that obtains among the judges that are out in the Territories, we felt that there would be but little if any trouble on this subject, and there would scarcely be an instance where any two of the judges in a Territory would seek to combine against the third, or where there would be any effort to arrange the districts or make assignments so as to do injustice to any member of the court.

It will be seen that under this substitute the three judges can arrange it so that they can change the holding of the courts by alternating. It is not uncommon in the Territories that some portion of the Territory is more desirable to reside in, more desirable for holding courts, than other portions; and if it were left to the Legislature, it was presented and made known to us that frequently a designing judge might by importunity and by a system of log-rolling—if I may use such an expression in connection with judges—perhaps get himself assigned to the best portion of the country, while the others would have to go to those that are less desirable. It was believed that if this matter was left to the judges in the first instance, they would be more likely to arrange it in such a way as would be acceptable to the judges themselves and best for the administration of justice.

The Senator from West Virginia has suggested that the delegates from the Territories prefer the other arrangement. I think it but due to say that since this bill was prepared they have so suggested to me, but I think that it is upon grounds that, if they were investigated and the whole matter seen as it really is, they would not be very tenacious about. Some of them, perhaps, are a good deal so, but others not so much so. There has been not a little trouble in some of the Territories touching this very question, and it has been brought to our attention that very great injustice has been done to judges by assigning them to a portion of a Territory that was quite undesirable, sending them hundreds and hundreds of miles away, and seemingly for the very purpose of doing injustice to an individual judge, and benefiting the other members of the court.

Between judges themselves we have no thought that this would occur. We believe the judges themselves will always arrange it so as that they will be reasonably satisfied on the subject; while if you refer the matter to the Legislature, you will find that this trouble will continue and that we shall be called upon at the next session of Congress, or if not then soon thereafter, to re-examine this whole matter. The amendment as it is prepared, I may say, was in accordance with what we understood to be the wishes of the several Territories at the time it was prepared. The committee proposed this amendment after examining the whole subject, and I believe were unanimous in making the recommendation as it now stands.

Mr. SARGENT. In matters local in their character the opinions of those who are directly interested and who are consequently well informed with reference to the facts are most valuable to determine what our course should be. The Delegates from the Territories are not judges and they are not members of the Legislature. They can have no motives except those which make to the best interest of their people. They are unanimous upon this proposition. I have talked with most of them, and I understand from those with whom I have conversed that they have all one opinion. I have talked with the Delegates from Colorado, from Wyoming, from Arizona, and from Montana, and they all say that it is infinitely preferable that the Legislature shall create the districts, mark their boundaries, and fix the places where courts shall be held, and they further say that the judges themselves prefer that this should be done.

The Territories, of course, have very large areas; sometimes the different parts of the Territories are separated by ranges of mountains. On each side of a range of mountains there may be comparatively unimportant communities which need that courts should be held locally, while it is possible that on one side rather than on the other there may be places more pleasant for the judges to select as places of residence. The temptation is continually before them, if they have the disposal of the matter, to crowd to the center of the Territory, or some place where it is more pleasant for them to live, than to go across the mountains or go to the more remote parts of the Territory. The result is that suitors who have business before their courts are put to enormous expense for the travel of their witnesses to attend the courts at long distances from their homes. It is upon a small scale a denial of justice. I might almost say to a minor extent it is a violation of that principle which is recognized in the fundamental law, that the people shall not be called to places remote from their homes in order to secure justice. As my friend from Delaware says, they shall have justice brought to their doors.

The Legislature can have no motive in a matter of this kind except to so arrange the districts as shall be for the greatest convenience of their people. I do not believe in wholesale charges against territorial Legislatures or against Congress; and I respect the purity of the majority of the body. I think that with public reasons to act upon, they will act upon public reasons. To put it in the hands of those who are directly interested, whose ease is concerned, who may be disposed to locate themselves where it is easier to get through the year and draw the salary and have the most ease and be at the least trouble in performing their duties, seems to me to be reposing this power in the wrong hands. The Legislature which we create and authorize to make counties, to designate county seats, to perform all the local legislation of the Territories, ought to be the safest guardian for interests of this kind.

The Senator from Iowa says that it is thought sometimes that some judges are assigned to inconvenient districts and kept there, and some are not. Under which system does this take place? All three systems prevail. The judges in some of the Territories assign each other. Does the difficulty arise where they make the assignment? In Arizona, one of the Territories where the Legislature regulates this matter, they are perfectly satisfied; the judges are satisfied and the people are satisfied with the manner in which it is done. I do not think the complaint of injustice to any judges comes from either of those Territories where the matter is fixed by the legislative body.

I think that the wish, that the opinion of the Delegates ought to have great weight. It had weight with the House of Representatives, and they sent us the original bill. Now, without any specific or good reason it seems to me being given—I have answered the reasons given by the Senator from Iowa—we propose to change it and to put this question in the hands of the judges alone.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the Senator heard of any case where justice was not brought home to the doors of the people, as he expresses it, owing to the fact that districts have not been properly allotted?

Mr. SARGENT. I know there is a very great unwillingness on the part of the judges to go to places in the district which are remote from the centers. They prefer to live in the centers. There is a tendency to gravitate toward the center of the Territory, or the more populous part. Take Utah, for instance, although it is not covered by this bill. Salt Lake is the most desirable place in the whole Territory for judges to reside, and they will get as near Salt Lake as possible; while the other parts of the Territory are very important, have a large amount of legal business, and are apt to be overlooked under this system, unless there are men who take the interest of these localities to heart and who are in the Legislature to speak for their constituents, to protest against the growing costs of litigation, and to ask that there may be a fair assignment?

It seems to me that it is much better to leave it as the House has done, in the hands of the local Legislature, and if it is found subsequently that injury is done by this, that there is cause of complaint, we can soon remedy it. There certainly is more stability under the House bill than there is under the Senate bill in the assignment of districts, because the Legislature cannot make changes, even in view of any growth of the Territory, oftener than once in two years, whereas the judges themselves are authorized to do this annually, to change around like the figures of the kaleidoscope, and certainly there is not permanence enough in a judicial system or in a court or man who presides over a court under such a plan. I think for that reason, and speaking on the promptings of the intelligent gentlemen who represent the Territories, it would be much better to reject the amendment recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from California does not discuss this case as it was understood by the Committee on the Judiciary. In the first place the committee did not understand, I had never heard before myself, that there was or had been any difficulty or complaint touching a failure to establish districts and locate courts properly in those districts. It was to such a difficulty or complaint that the Senator addressed a part of his argument. No such thing is in the case as it reached the committee. The whole subject was of a different character. It related to the matter to which the Senator adverted in another part of his remarks, namely, the choice which judges might have between district and district in a Territory. It was that and nothing else. The committee determined upon this substitute, not upon hearsay, not by guess-work, not by caprice, but upon an understanding which I think would be quite satisfactory to the Senator from California and every other Senator.

In the first place, the committee had before them statements made by the judges themselves, and from those statements it turned out that there was one difficulty which the Senator from Iowa forgot to mention in his statement; there was not only a diversity arising from the circumstance that in one Territory the Legislature assigned judges, in another Territory the governor, and in another the court, but there was difficulty in the fact that a majority of the judges in some cases could not do it; in other words, the statute was held to mean that the whole court with unanimity must act, or it was no action at all. Thus contrariety and thus difficulty had ensued; several of the judges, speaking for themselves in their own letters, said that if it could be done by the court or a majority of the court, if a member was absent, or could not act, or there was discord, the whole case would be provided for and the difficulty would be at an end. This was the opinion of other persons also; and when my honorable friend from California says that all the Delegates from all the Territories are adverse to this amendment, my impression is that he goes much too far. I have conversed with some of the Delegates in regard to it myself, and I think upon an understanding and discussion it will turn out that really no such thing exists as a unanimous opposition by the Delegates from the Territories.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. I will state that the Delegates from Colorado, Wyoming, Arizona, and Montana came over to the Senate and told me that they were opposed to this provision, and I understood—I distinctly heard some of them state—that that was the unanimous opinion of the Delegates.

Mr. CONKLING. I so heard the Senator state before.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to state that the Delegate from Washington Territory also makes the same objection.

Mr. CONKLING. I listened to that statement before when the Senator from California made it; and I repeat my statement that I think he will find that the Delegates from the Territories are not unanimously opposed to this provision. Doubtless the Senator has reason for what he says. I think I have reason for what I say. However that may be, as between these conflicting modes of doing it, the Senate is brought to comprehend the merits of the proposition; and upon that I desire to say one word.

The Senator from California thinks it would be wise to set the Legislature at work in the first place, and if that fails, then we might take some other mode of doing it. The Committee on the Judiciary thought that a double chance and a double provision was better: first, to allow the judges to do it, and if they failed, then in the same bill to confer upon the Legislature the power to act.

Mr. SARGENT. That is also provided in the House bill; first, to confer the power on the Legislature, and if they fail, then to authorize the judges to act.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend would listen to what I am saying he would see that I am addressing myself to that very fact; and I say that puts the cart before the horse; and if the Senator will hear me I am going to state why. I say the committee reversed that order; and they did it not at hazard, but because they thought it was wise to do so, to allow the judges, in the first place, to make satisfactory provision, if they could, without invoking any of the forces or opportunities which surround a legislative competition for a choice of districts, and if the judges failed or refused, then, without further legislation by Congress, to confer upon the Legislature the power, and enjoin upon the Legislature the duty, of setting the matter right. That seemed to the committee to be wise, and for several reasons, to one or two of which I will refer.

There is nothing exceptional in this case in committing such a power to the judges. The highest court in the land, sitting in the Capitol, does the same thing. Has there ever been any difficulty in allowing the Chief Justice, as the organ of the court, to distribute the judges in the various circuits? Not at all. It would be rather an odd thing to provide that Congress should do it, and if Congress failed to do it, then that the court might do it, and to assume, as this debate assumes, that there must necessarily be some impropriety or ill-motive in the court if they attempted to do it.

Mr. SARGENT. If my friend will allow me a moment, do I understand him to say that the power which he speaks of goes to the question of fixing the boundaries of the districts in the United States and fixing the times and places of holding courts therein?

Mr. CONKLING. I had not said that. It would not have been true if I had said it.

Mr. SARGENT. That is what this bill provides, and therein it differs from the illustration which the Senator gives.

Mr. CONKLING. I thought I had disposed of that element in the case by correcting a statement made by the Senator before, which I sought to do by saying that there is no complaint in respect of the boundaries of the districts or the places where the courts are held. That question is not up, as we should say in court, and therefore it is not necessary to consider it. On the contrary, I repeat again, and I ask the Senate to observe it, that the only matter in question upon this bill is as to the allotment of judges in these districts. There is no pretense of anything else.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator dismisses everything else; but I wish to say that that is one of the objections made by the Delegates to the bill; one which they dwelt upon with me, and one which I urged in the few remarks that I made.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator say to me that any Delegate told him that in any Territory there is complaint that the districts are not properly bounded and the courts properly located?

Mr. SARGENT. I say the Delegates claim that under the provisions of this bill there is danger of both these contingencies.

Mr. CONKLING. I have heard the Senator say that, and my answer to it is that in point of fact there is no such thing in the case. The phraseology of the bill does apply undoubtedly, as he says, to the districting of the Territories. The districts are made. There is no complaint about it; there is no difficulty in regard to that, the whole question being as to which judge shall serve in the respective districts; and therefore I am addressing myself to the matter in difference, and not to that matter which might be in difference, but is not in fact a subject of controversy at all.

I was going therefore to say that it seems to me entirely unwarranted, and that I think was the judgment of the committee, to assume, as the Senator does assume in a portion of his remarks, that the bench of the Territories is likely to be composed of men so unworthy that they would sit down to jockey or cheat or impose upon each other in respect to a fair and equitable distribution of duties. It seems to me that when in the bill you have placed a supervisory power by the Legislature to act if the court does not act, that is enough, without assuming that the judges are to behave like rascals, or to sit down to pick each other's pockets. As far as I know the judges in the Territories, it would be quite unjust and quite unreasonable to assume any such thing; and I know that in some instances—I do not speak now of that unanimity which the Senator thought prevailed among the Delegates of the Territories; I have not canvassed all the judges; the committee have not letters from them all before it—but speaking of some of the Territories, I do know from letters which have been addressed to me that the judges say that all difficulty on this subject would disappear if the court was simply permitted in the first instance by a quorum of the court to fix the allotment in case they could do so, leaving the Legislature to intervene afterward and act if the court was unable or unwilling so to do. That was the view of the committee; and my impression is, from a somewhat careful consideration of the subject, if the Senate will just allow this to be tried, it will put an end to the whole matter. If it does not, I say to the Senator from California that when this courteous and reasonable opportunity has been given to the courts to dispose of this matter themselves, if they fail and if the plan fails, it will be very easy at the next session of Congress to correct it, and in the mean time no difficulty will have occurred.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the judges of the courts are generally men of intelligence and character, and they are well informed as to the necessities of the districts and as to the legal business which is to be done. It seems to me that they have the intelligence and the character making them the safest judges on this subject, and the general good feeling which exists among the members of the bench would secure impartiality and fairness; but if it does not, if they cannot agree, the whole subject under this amendment is to go to the Legislature. It certainly cannot be insisted that the Legislature of a Territory is a body having more information or higher character than the judges who are appointed in these courts Therefore I certainly think that the shape in which the bill is now amended is much better than that in which it came from the House of Representatives. The whole effect of the amendment is first to leave this matter to the judges, and if they fail, then to the Legislature. The bill as it came to the Senate left it first to the Legislature, and if they failed, to the judges.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have very great respect for the Committee on the Judiciary, and especially for their deliberately expressed judgment, but I must beg to dissent from the amendment which the committee propose. It provides that the judges of the Territory shall fix the districts and they shall do it annually; that they shall fix the times for holding the courts and the places for holding the courts, and that they shall allot the judges to hold them. With all respect to the committee, I think that is wrong. It seems to me that the fixing of the districts and the times and places of holding the courts is especially a legislative power, and one that ought to be exercised by the Legislature. The members of the Legislature certainly are more familiar with the wants of the people located all over the Territory than a judge who does not get close to the people or know much about their wants. My observation of the profession is, that the judges are the least qualified of all men to know where a court ought to be held or when it ought to be held. It is their business to hold the court and administer the law at the time and place designated by the legislative power. That is so in the States, and it seems to me it ought to be so in the Territories.

Besides, while ordinarily (I am glad to be able to say it) we have competent and able men upon the bench, it is not infrequent that we have lazy men upon the bench, men who do not busy themselves about looking after the wants and interests of the people. When the litigation of the country is brought before the judges in court, they hear the facts of the case and apply the law to it, and that is the end of it with them. It is not well that they should be too close to the people or too much among them. They ought to sit where they are disinterested; and I say therefore they are less qualified than the Legislature to determine the time when and the place where the court should be held, or the size of a district or how districts ought to be regulated. If I comprehend the proposed amendment, it provides that the judges shall arrange all these matters.

It often happens that the people are very jealous of the times of holding courts, the places of holding courts, and the compass and form of the districts. I think it would be placing the judges in a very unhappy situation as judges to have the people complaining of them that they have not laid off this district in a way that suits the convenience of the populace, or have not held court at the particular place to suit the convenience of a locality, or have not held it at a time to suit one portion of the community or another portion. It imposes upon them a labor that does not pertain legitimately to their office, and it imposes it in such a way as is calculated to engender prejudice against the judges. It seems to me that the Legislature is the appropriate power to fix the time and place of holding court and the form of the district, and the judges ought only to be charged to hold the courts, and they ought to be charged by the law and their oath of office to hold courts at the time and place designated by the Legislature.

Mr. BOREMAN. I did not mean by anything I said to convey the idea that the judges in the Territories were worse than other men; but we admit that they are human, and if you leave this matter to them, it will be nothing but what would result from the ordinary course of things that each judge would like to have a better place, and in these Territories there are great preferences. Some portions of a Territory are comparatively a wilderness, while in other portions they have cities, comfortable places for living, and so on. The assignment to a particular district in a Territory is sometimes almost a banishment for the time being, away from railroads and the ordinary conveyances of travel, and the other conveniencies that we have in the States.

Now, sir, this provision is anomalous. I do not know of any State where this is allowed to be done by the judges. As I remarked before, it is generally fixed for the time by a constitutional convention, and subsequently by the Legislature. Judges are elected for particular districts by the people. They are elected by the people for a particular territory. Here we propose to allow the Legislature of the Territory to set off the districts. Judges are human beings, as I remarked, and they are influenced just like any other men as to their own interests. We propose not to devolve upon them the necessity of taking action upon their own interests, but we propose, or the House proposes by this bill, to repose that power in an impartial body of men, to wit, the Legislature of the Territory, which, as has been well remarked by the Senator from California, must know the wants of the different portions of the Territory equally with the judges. They are sent up by the people to represent their interests. They understand better no doubt how these districts should be arranged, and they will understand the will of their people as to the quality and character and capacity of the judge to be assigned to a particular district. I cannot see from the various reasons which have been assigned by different members of the Judiciary Committee, why we should substitute what they have reported rather than take what the House has sent to us. I think the House proposition is the better one.

Mr. WRIGHT. I only wish to add one word. If I supposed, as is implied by what has been said on the other side of this question, that there was a necessary or probable antagonism between the judges and the people of a Territory, and that the judges would arrange the districts for their own interests and would not consult the interests of the people of the Territory, I should conclude just as those Senators do. But the result of my observation and experience is that the judges are in as hearty sympathy with the people of the Territory and as solicitous for the best interests of the Territory as any other officers who are sent there or who may be there. I have no idea that these judges when they come to arrange their districts will ever for one moment think of anything else than what they believe to be the best interests of the people over whom they have to preside as judges. I believe that there is such kindliness of feeling between these judges, men of character and intelligence, that when they come to determine this question they will have reference to the best interests of the people and the convenience of each judge as far as possible.

It is suggested by the Senator from West Virginia that he is not aware that in any State it is left to the judges to assign the times for the holding of courts and who shall hold such courts. I beg to say to him that in my own State we have a general law, under which the district and circuit judges, the territorial jurisdiction of each being the same, meet during the month of January each year and arrange the terms throughout that year when the courts are to be held, how many are to be held, and for what length of time. The places are fixed by the general law; that is of course at the county towns; but the judges themselves fix the time of holding the courts, how long they shall hold their terms, &c., and I have never heard a single suggestion of any trouble in connection with the power thus given to the judges. I doubt not it is the same in other States also.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator to withdraw that for a moment while I make a remark. Indeed I think he ought to let us take a vote on this bill.

Mr. CAMERON. May I ask the Senator for what purpose he desires the floor?

Mr. CONKLING. I simply want to make a remark.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator renew the motion afterward?

Mr. CONKLING. I wish the Senator would not insist upon his motion now, because this bill ought to be disposed of. It is a crying matter. We can vote in a moment. I do not think there will be any more debate.

Mr. CAMERON. I will yield for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SCOTT in the chair.) The Senator from Pennsylvania withdraws his motion.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, a moment ago, when somewhat inadvertently I said a word about this matter without having the bill before me, I did not venture to say what I recollected, as I thought, and what the bill shows. I want now to bring it to the attention of the Senate. The House bill contained not one word of that upon which my friend from North Carolina so eloquently discoursed, not one syllable touching the fixing of boundaries of districts, the places where courts should be held, or anything whatever of that sort. Let me read to the honorable Senator the House bill:

The Legislature of each of the organized Territories, except the Territory of Utah, shall at each regular session thereof make an assignment of the judges to hold the courts in the several districts of such Territories.

That is all.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think that is right.

Mr. CONKLING. That is another question, whether the Senator thinks that is right or not; but he went on to argue that the districts ought to be fixed by the Legislature; that the place of holding the courts ought to be fixed by the Legislature, and so on, and therefore he was in favor of the House bill. Now it turns out that the House bill has not one syllable or one letter on that subject, but is confined wholly to a provision authorizing the Legislature, hit or miss, to send every man where it pleases to the districts which have been constituted.

Now what is to be the effect of that practically? Either the Legislature is to go on without consulting with the judges and allot them, so that whether it is judicious and convenient or not is about either way equally probable, or else it is to do it in connection with the judges, they being, as every lawyer understands, far more able to do this, if they act sincerely, than anybody else can be. If it is to be done in consultation with the judges, then it becomes matter of favoritism, it becomes matter of legislative persuasion, it becomes matter in which members of the bar are asked to take part as friends of this judge or of that judge to the end that these questions of preference in districts may be settled to please them.

I say, Mr. President, that if it be true that such questions must be carried to the Legislature, it will be time enough to carry them there when judges have shown so little manhood, so little sense, so little fitness for their places that they cannot adjust that among themselves—a thing adjusted in all other courts and among all other men without difficulty.

But my purpose was simply to bring to the knowledge of the Senate the fact that the House bill conferred no power upon the Legislature to bound or fix districts or locate courts or do anything in the world save only to assign the judges to particular districts; that is all. Now, in lieu of that comes the amendment of the Senate committee. I see the Senator from Pennsylvania rising to renew his motion for an executive session; but before taking my seat I wish to say to the Senator that I think if he would withhold his motion so long as would be necessary to enable a vote to be taken on this subject, it would be useful, as I understand from the judges themselves that there is occasion for some expedition in this matter.

Mr. CAMERON. Before I renew my motion——

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senator to allow me to reply to a remark made by the Senator who has just taken his seat.

Mr. CAMERON. I only wish to say to the Senate that I believe if we adjourn upon this question the Calendar will come up to-morrow as a matter of course. I now renew my motion.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Allow me to ask, if we adjourn now will the Calendar be in order to-morrow?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I mean is there any arrangement or agreement about the Calendar to-morrow?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will come up at one o'clock without a motion. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 2124) authorizing the changing of the name of the steamer Fanny Lehr—to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 2866) relieving the legal and political disabilities of Fitzhugh Lee—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 2867) to authorize the use of certain unexpended balances in the United States Treasury—to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 2868) to render available an unexpended balance of appropriation for collection and payment for bounty, &c., for colored soldiers and sailors—to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 2716) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary C. Reno—to the Committee on Pensions.

CREDITORS OF BANDS OF SIOUX INDIANS.

The bill (H. R. No. 420) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to discharge certain obligations of the United States to the creditors of the Upper and Lower bands of Sioux Indians was read.

Mr. RAMSEY. I suppose the honorable Senator from Missouri who reported a bill of a like character from the Committee on Indian Affairs would wish to have this bill go on the Calendar. This bill from the House is just like the one he reported.

Mr. BOGY. Certainly; I ask that it go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and eighteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 7, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

JAMES A. DREW AND OTHERS.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Claims a bill (H. R. No. 2873) for the relief of James A. Drew and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

MEMORIAL SERVICES OF PROFESSOR MORSE.

Mr. DONNAN. The Committee on Printing have instructed me to report the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed five thousand copies of the memorial services which were held in the House of Representatives, April 16, 1873, in commemoration and honor of the late Samuel F. B. Morse; thirty-five hundred of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and fifteen hundred for the use of the Senate.

The Committee on Printing, having a resolution referred to them on this subject, have reported this concurrent resolution as a substitute; it being necessary from the fact that the cost of publication is beyond the authority of the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

CORRECTION.

Mr. BRADLEY. I rise to make an explanation. In the proceedings of yesterday I am reported as stating that the amount of land granted to the Wisconsin Central Railroad was two hundred million acres. I may have so stated; but I wish to say, by way of correction, that the amount is only two million two hundred thousand acres.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COBURN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at thirteen minutes past twelve o'clock. The call of committees for reports will be resumed.

COOLY LABOR.

On motion of Mr. MONROE, the Committee on Education and Labor was discharged from the further consideration of the following bills; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 1497) to prohibit contracts for servile labor;

A bill (H. R. No. 1148) providing for a commission to collect information relative to the condition of the Chinese in the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 739) to prohibit the employment of cooly labor.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MONROE. The Committee on Education and Labor have instructed me to report back adversely bills of the following titles; and I move that they be laid upon the table:

A bill (H. R. No. 1887) to promote education in the several Territories;

A bill (H. R. No. 380) granting one million acres of the public lands to the trustees of the Brown Institute, in the State of Florida; and

A bill (H. R. No. 382) donating the building formerly used as the United States court-house at Saint Augustine, Florida, to the State of Florida, for educational purposes.

Mr. DUNNELL. In reference to that first bill, Mr. Speaker, I move it be placed upon the general Calendar instead of being laid upon the table. It is an important measure, and of very great interest to the Territories, and I hope it will be put upon the general Calendar so it may come up for discussion hereafter.

The SPEAKER. Should the motion to lay upon the table not prevail, the Chair will then put the other motion.

Mr. MONROE. I suggest the question be first taken in reference to the other bills, as I presume there will be no dispute about them.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, that will be done.

The bills were laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] has also reported back adversely from the Committee on Education and Labor a bill (H. R. No. 1887) to promote education in the several Territories, and moved that it be laid upon the table. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] submits the motion that the bill be put upon the general Calendar. If the motion to lie does not prevail, the Chair will submit the other motion.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The motion of the gentleman from Minnesota is one which is rarely made. Now suppose when a motion of that sort is made that the motion to lay upon the table is voted down, what would naturally become of this bill if the point of order be made against it that it makes an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. It would go there as a matter of course. A bill is read a first and second time when it is referred to a committee, and when it is reported back the question then recurs, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time? Pending that motion, the gentleman who reported this bill moves that it be laid upon the table. If the House refuses to lay the bill upon the table, the next question will be, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time? If then the point of order be made that it contains an appropriation of property, it must, of course, go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the House will test the question on the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Let the bill be read.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If the rule is strictly insisted upon, would not the bill go to the general Calendar before the vote is taken upon the motion to lay upon the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so ruled heretofore when a bill is reported back adversely.

Mr. MONROE. I ask unanimous consent to offer a word of explanation in regard to this bill.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I should like to hear the bill read first and then we can hear the explanation of it.

Mr. DUNNELL. It is a long bill.

Mr. MONROE. I can state in a single sentence what the object of the bill is so the House will understand it.

The bill provides that the Territories, while in the territorial condition, may proceed to sell sections 16 and 36, which under the policy of Congress have heretofore been reserved for educational purposes until the Territories should be admitted as States. Heretofore always these sections have been reserved until the admission of the Territory. The proposition is that the territorial Legislature may sell these sections and invest the moneys arising therefrom, with the aid of the Secretary of the Interior, and the interest resulting from these investments may be applied for school purposes.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let the gentleman state the minimum price.

Mr. MONROE. The bill also provides those lands shall not in any case be sold for less than five dollars an acre in alternate sections bordering on railroads, nor for less than two and a half dollars when in any other portion of the Territory. Now, I only wish to say that the committee felt a great deal of sympathy with this bill, and at first some attempt was made in the committee to amend it so as to make it acceptable.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Was the committee united in making this report?

Mr. MONROE. The report is made unanimously from that committee. On the whole the committee thought it best to pursue the policy which has been pursued in regard to these sections in the several Territories, but at the same time I wish to say we have had so much sympathy with any disposition in the House to aid anything to further the common education of the people, that I think the committee would not expect me to resist earnestly any proposition to send the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe the necessity for the ruling the Chair has made. If the discussion which the gentleman from Ohio has been allowed to make had taken place on the question ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, it would have been too late to make the point of order; but in order that there may be discussion, the Chair has ruled against any summary disposition of the bill by a motion to lay upon the table, allowing the point of order to take precedence. Therefore the bill goes, the point of order having been made, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RANDALL. Do I understand the Chair to decide that the question on this bill is not to be first taken on the motion to lay on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so ruled two or three times this session; because it is in the interest of free discussion that the bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RANDALL. It is in the interest of free gifts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not; and the Chair wishes the House to understand that under this ruling, in his judgment, nothing can pass which has not two-thirds in its favor.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. There is no necessity for that; because to bring it back makes it liable to the same point of order against it.

Mr. CHAFFEE. Would it be in order to move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands?

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union takes precedence; and if the Committee on the Public Lands reported it back the point of order would carry it there. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will please give attention to this consideration in further support of the ruling of the Chair, that to permit the motion to lay on the table, as the only one which there was a right to make, would bring it before the House if that motion were negatived.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly; but I took it for granted that the House would follow the recommendation of the committee; and the decision of the Speaker gives the right to have the bill considered if two-thirds of the House desire, and then a majority to lay it on the table.

The SPEAKER. But suppose the House did not follow the decision of the committee; the bill would then be before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. But I would have the sense of the House tested on the question of laying on the table, before the decision of the Speaker comes in.

The SPEAKER. But if the House does not vote with the recommendation of the committee, the bill is before the House for consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have the sense of the House tested before the Chair's decision comes in.

The SPEAKER. The decision of the Chair does not depend on the sense of the House, but on the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. I would not have the point of order admitted by the Speaker until it was seen whether the House would follow the recommendation of the committee to lay on the table the bill.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair took that course he would be acting in an arbitrary sense, because he would be giving the full force of the rules on the friends of the bill, rather than to the decision of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. It would be yielding to a single individual, who has the privilege of raising the point of order. In the other way, it would be testing the sense of the House, by a majority vote, whether it should go to the Committee of the Whole or not.

CIRCUIT COURTS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. E. R. HOAR, from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 2246 a bill (H. R. No. 2874) relating to the circuit courts of the United States for the districts of Alabama; which was read a first and second time.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill at length. Before he had concluded,

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe this bill is subject to a point of order, and I desire to make it.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill, I understand, creates a clerkship at least.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not paying sufficiently close attention to the bill when the Clerk was reading it. The gentleman from Indiana will please point out the portion which he considers makes the bill liable to the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The bill has not been printed.

The SPEAKER. This is a substitute. The original bill is printed.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I will state in a single word what the bill proposes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The point of order meanwhile being reserved.

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. If the point of order lies against the bill I can tell the gentleman on what it must be based. In an act passed last year which abolished in Alabama the system, of which I believe one of the last remnants was in that State, of giving district courts circuit-court powers so that they do not come under the jurisdiction, therefore, of the circuit courts which have been established, it was provided that the circuit-court business pending in the northern and middle districts of Alabama should be transferred to the circuit court held at Mobile for the southern district. It was also provided that the circuit court should have revisory and appellate power over the district courts in the northern and middle districts. It also took away from the northern and middle districts the circuit-court jurisdiction. But by a singular omission it did not provide for circuit-court jurisdiction anywhere over those two districts for the future; and the circuit judge has delivered a learned and able opinion in which he held that there was no provision of law under which, in cases exclusively of circuit-court original jurisdiction, any inhabitants of the northern and middle districts of Alabama could be sued.

It is to remedy that that this bill is designed. Petitions have come from the bar all over the State asking for some remedy, and there were two forms in which it was asked. One was simply to extend the circuit jurisdiction of the circuit court established at Mobile over the whole State. The other proposed that there should be two additional circuit courts held, one at Montgomery and the other at Huntsville, for the northern and middle districts. Bills for both these purposes were referred to the committee. It was thought that it would be too many to have three circuit courts for that State; but that Northern Alabama was so separated in the way of railroad communication, the people having to go out of the State to get to the southern part of the State, that it was reasonable that there should be two circuit courts held in the State, and the committee have reported this bill simply to provide for original circuit-court jurisdiction for the people of Northern and Middle Alabama, providing that Northern Alabama shall have it at the circuit court at Huntsville, and that Middle Alabama shall have it at Mobile in connection with the present circuit court there.

The only thing that the bill provides in the way of expense is that the term of the circuit court to be held at Huntsville shall have a clerk. If that be an objection under the point of order taken, it exists. The bill makes no other appropriation or provision for expense that I am aware of.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If my colleague will permit me, I will say that Judge WHITE, of Alabama, and Mr. RAPIER, of that State, whose district loses a court, are both absent. Mr. WHITE is sick in bed. If my colleague will propose to fix a time when this bill shall be considered, I have no doubt the House will agree to it.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I would do so very cheerfully. I received a communication from Mr. WHITE containing a request, which I was very sorry not to be able to comply with, for delay, but I did not know that our committee would be called again for an indefinite period, and therefore I was compelled to report the bill. I have endeavored to see all the other gentlemen from Alabama that I could, and to have their views acceded to. The gentlemen whom I have seen could not state to me any objection to the bill that I could understand.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would suggest that my colleague let the bill be recommitted and ordered to be printed, and then let him enter a motion to reconsider, so that he can bring it up at any time.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The bill has been printed. The only alteration made by the substitute is to strike out the circuit court for the middle district of Alabama. That is all the change in the bill. I am willing to accede to the suggestion of my colleague.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] suggests that the bill be ordered to be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Revision of the Laws, and what further?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. And that it be made the special order for Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. There is already a special order for that day.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let the gentleman ask leave to report at any time.

Mr. POLAND. I do not apprehend that the bill will occupy any time when it comes up.

Mr. PELHAM. I think it will.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I suggest that the bill be recommitted and ordered to be printed, and a motion to reconsider entered.

The SPEAKER. Is that arrangement acceded to by the House?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to that proposition. I understood at first that the effect of the bill was to increase not only the number of circuit courts, but also the number of the district courts of the United States. I find I was mistaken in that, and I have no objection to the arrangement proposed.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Revision of the Laws and ordered to be printed, and a motion entered to reconsider, the bill to be brought back at any time for consideration in the House. As there has been some misunderstanding about other bills, it is distinctly understood that this bill may be called up for consideration in the House at any time. The Chair hears no objection.

POST-ROUTES.

Mr. POLAND, from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2879) revising and embodying all the laws authorizing post-routes in force on the 1st of December, 1873; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to say a word in reference to this matter. About a year ago, just at the close of the last Congress, a bill was passed directing the Committees on Revision of the Laws, of the Senate and House of Representatives, to agree with some person or persons to take charge of the revision that had been made by the commissioners and prepare it in bill form to be brought before Congress, and they were also directed to contract with the person or persons so employed to prepare a bill revising and emboding in one act all laws authorizing post-routes in force at the expiration of the then session of Congress. This bill is a revision of all post-routes in the United States, making a volume of some six hundred pages, consisting entirely of a list of post-roads. The committee felt instructed by the act of last session to bring this bill before the House and ask its passage; but I hope something may transpire that will render it unnecessary that we should publish in our forthcoming volume of the revised statutes these six hundred pages of post-routes.

I have introduced a bill which is now pending before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House declaring all public highways in the United States post-routes. If that bill shall become a law, as I hope it may, it will dispense with the necessity of publishing this list of post-roads.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I will state to the gentleman that the bill which he has introduced and which has been referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was referred to a sub-committee of that committee of which I am chairman. I entertain the same views as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] relative to the validity and constitutionality of that bill. But I am told that the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate have decided—how the question got before that committee I cannot say—that a bill of that kind would be in conflict with the Constitution.

Mr. POLAND. I have no knowledge of what the Judiciary Committee of the Senate may have decided in relation to this matter. I can hardly believe, however, that they have come to any such conclusion as the gentleman indicates. Even if they have, I am by no means prepared to come to the same conclusion myself. We have already upon the statute-book a law declaring that all railroads that are now built, and all railroads that hereafter may be built, shall be post-routes. We have also a statute declaring that all the navigable waters of the United States and all canals shall be post-routes.

I know it has been suggested sometimes that this power of establishing post-routes might be delegated to the Postmaster-General. To that it has been replied that the Constitution vested Congress with the power to establish post-routes. But the language of the Constitution is the same in relation to post-routes that it is in relation to post-offices: "Congress shall have power to establish post-offices and post-roads." From the beginning of the Government, ever since we have had a Post-Office Department, we have delegated to the Postmaster-General the power to establish post-offices. And why we may not with equal propriety and equal constitutionality delegate to him the power to establish post-routes is more than I know. The precedents which have been established by the legislation of Congress making railroads, canals, and navigable waters post-routes are abundant authority, if the action of Congress is any authority upon this subject, for making all highways post-routes.

Although I trust we may be able to get rid of this whole subject, I ask that this revision may be adopted, and we can determine hereafter whether it will be necessary to publish it or not. I trust such action will be taken as will render its publication unnecessary.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. POTTER. I notice that in the copy of the bill sent to the Clerk's desk the first nineteen lines have been erased, and I suppose it is intended that they shall not be in the bill.

Mr. POLAND. They cover general provisions of law found in the revised statutes proper which we have already passed, and therefore they are struck out of this bill. This bill contains nothing but about six hundred solid printed pages of post-routes.

Mr. POTTER. Under these circumstances I do not think that I am called upon to make an objection to the bill not having been read in full. I merely want to call the attention of the House to this as an exceptional case.

Mr. POLAND. I believe it never has been the practice to read post-route bills in full.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does this bill go to the extent of making any general laws covering post-routes without naming them; or does it name specifically the different routes?

Mr. POLAND. It names specifically all the routes in the United States which were in existence previous to the commencement of this session.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman one further question: whether, in the course of preparation of this bill, the committee did or did not notice that a very considerable number of roads declared to be post-routes have never been used as such?

Mr. POLAND. We had no means of knowing upon what routes mail service was actually performed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think there is danger of our going too far and making too large a number of post-routes, and putting it out of the power and the discretion of the Postmaster-General to dispense with any of them.

Mr. POLAND. This bill makes no post-routes, but merely enumerates those which Congress has already established.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is not this in your regular revision already?

Mr. POLAND. It is not; it is a separate chapter.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I now ask unanimous consent that the bill just passed may be engrossed upon a printed copy, containing as it does nothing whatever but the post-routes of the United States.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

EVIDENCE IN CLAIMS.

Mr. POLAND, from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2875) authorizing the use of certain evidence; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides that where evidence was legally taken and filed in any case pending in the Court of Claims prior to the 4th day of July, 1864, which case was dismissed under the provisions of the act of said July 4, 1864, such evidence shall be legally admissible before any Department, committee, or commission before whom the same cause of action or claim may be brought or presented for adjudication.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, it is proper perhaps that a word of explanation should be made in reference to this bill. By the act of July 4, 1864, among other things jurisdiction was taken away from the Court of Claims over all claims for the destruction or appropriation of property by the armies of the United States or property taken for the use of the Army. A very large number of cases of that character which were pending in the Court of Claims were dismissed from the docket of that court in consequence of this taking away of its jurisdiction. The petitioners or plaintiffs in these cases filed a petition, which was referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws, praying for the restoration of the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims over their cases. The committee, on consideration, thought it would be very unwise and unjust to restore jurisdiction to the Court of Claims over a given number of cases when there were thousands of others of the same character over which neither the Court of Claims nor any other tribunal to our knowledge has any jurisdiction to allow them. Therefore the committee came to the conclusion that it would not be right to grant the prayer of the petitioners and restore jurisdiction. But one of the principal arguments in favor of that measure was that these cases had been prepared for trial, that the suitors had gone to the expense of taking testimony and filing it, and that this testimony had become useless. In view of this the committee came to the conclusion that all the relief Congress ought to grant would be to allow these parties to use any evidence that had been legally taken and filed in support of these claims, when brought before any Department of the Government or before the southern claims commission or before any committee of Congress. Hence we have provided in this bill that when any of those causes of action for which these suits were brought in the Court of Claims shall be brought before any other tribunal for adjudication, any evidence that was legally taken and filed while those cases were in the Court of Claims may be used on the hearing. That is all there is in the bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let me inquire (for I did not happen to be present at the last meeting of the committee) whether this bill enlarges the rights of any individual against the Government.

Mr. POLAND. Not in the slightest degree.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It does not give any right which does not exist already by law?

Mr. POLAND. It gives no jurisdiction to the Court of Claims or to anybody else to allow claims, but merely provides that in these cases, where the jurisdiction of that court was taken away, the parties, when they go before some other tribunal, may be allowed to use such evidence as they had legally taken and filed in the Court of Claims. This is all I desire to say, unless some gentleman wishes to make an inquiry.

Mr. SPEER. Is this bill similar to one which the House passed some time ago and sent to the Senate?

Mr. POLAND. No, sir.

Mr. SPEER. In the confusion of the Hall I was unable to hear the gentleman's explanation.

Mr. POLAND. The bill merely provides that as to a large class of cases in reference to which the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims was taken away by the act of 1864, the parties may use before any other tribunal the same evidence which they had taken and filed before the Court of Claims.

Mr. SPEER. That is right.

Mr. POLAND. That is all there is in the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. The bill does not change the act of July 4, 1864, at all?

Mr. POLAND. Not at all.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ZADOC WILLIAMS AND OTHERS.

Mr. POLAND. The same committee has instructed me to report back adversely the petition of Zadoc Williams and others, for the restoration of their cases, and to move that the petition be laid on the table. I have been at the trouble to write out a short report, which accompanies the petition.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let the report be printed.

The petition was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

MINTS AND ASSAY OFFICES.

Mr. HOOPER, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2876) to amend the coinage act of 1873; which was read a first and second time.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the forty-seventh section of the act entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relative to the mints and assay offices and coinage of the United States," approved February 12, 1873, be, and the same is hereby, so amended that it shall read as follows: "That for the purpose of enabling the mints and assay offices of the United States to make returns to depositors with as little delay as possible, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to keep in the said mints and assay offices, when the state of the Treasury will admit thereof, such an amount of public money or bullion as he shall judge convenient and necessary, out of which those who bring bullion to the said mints and assay offices may be paid the value thereof, less coinage and other mint charges and a reasonable charge for transportation, as soon as practicable after the value has been ascertained; and on payment thereof being made, the bullion so deposited shall become the property of the United States, and may be transferred to any mint or assay office for coinage or conversion into fine bars. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to use, as far as he may deem it proper and expedient, for payment to depositors of bullion, coin certificates representing coin in the Treasury and issued under the provisions of section 5 of the act entitled 'An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government,' approved March 3, 1863. But the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time withdraw the fund, or any portion thereof, and may also, from time to time, transfer to the office of the assistant treasurer at New York, from the bullion fund of any mint or assay office, refined gold bars, bearing the United States stamp of fineness, weight, and intrinsic value, or bars from any melt of foreign coin or bullion of standard equal to or above that of the United States, and may apply the same, at not less than par, to the redemption of coin certificates, or in exchange for gold coins at par, subject to such regulations as he may prescribe."

Mr. GARFIELD. There is one clause of this bill to which I wish to direct attention; and I would like the Speaker to rule whether the bill must not go to the Committee of the Whole, on the principle that it appropriates money to be deposited in the various assay offices and mints (places not now made depositories of money) to be paid out for bullion on its deposit and before it is coined.

Mr. HOOPER. In answer to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I would say that the mints and assay offices are a part of the Treasury of the United States, and placing money on deposit there is not taking it out of the Treasury.

Mr. GARFIELD. The point I make is this: Under the present law a party presenting bullion receives the money for it after it is coined. This bill proposes that the director of the mint shall pay the money on the deposit of the bullion. The question is whether that is not a payment of money out of the Treasury?

Mr. HOOPER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the law as it now stands:

That, for the purpose of enabling the mints and the assay office in New York to make returns to the depositors with as little delay as possible, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to keep in said mints and assay office, when the state of the Treasury will admit thereof, such an amount of public money or bullion to meet the payments immediately.

The bill merely extends that to the other assay offices. It does not take any money out of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. It proposes to exchange an old dollar for a new one.

Mr. HOOPER. Yes, sir,

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that the point of order lies against the bill. It does not take money out of the Treasury, but rather tends to bring money into it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] whether the existing law makes, for instance, the assay office at Boise City a public depository, a place where the Secretary of the Treasury may keep public money?

Mr. HOOPER. The existing law authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to make deposits of public money at the mints and at the assay office in New York. This bill proposes to extend the provision to other assay offices.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does this bill properly guard the public funds on deposit in these different assay offices?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Gentlemen carrying on conversation here might retire to the cloak-room.

Mr. GARFIELD. We will be glad to have the gentleman's company.

The SPEAKER. There are so many gentlemen carrying on conversation that the Chair thinks there must be a quorum listening.

Mr. WOOD. I suggest to the House thoroughly to understand the provisions of this bill before it attempts to act on it.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has been endeavoring to explain the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, the law of 1873 confines the bullion fund to the mints and the assay office in the city of New York. This amendment of the law extends it to all the assay offices and authorizes payment for bullion to be made with coin certificates issued under the provisions of section 5 of the act of March 3, 1873. As the law stands now they would have, in the mints and assay offices, to pay in coin. This allows them to pay in coin certificates.

The object of the amendment is to enable the different assay offices to make returns to depositors with as little delay as possible, and to save miners much of the delay and expense to which they are now subjected.

It involves no additional expense to the Government, but, on the contrary, it is believed it will be a great saving of expense. While it will be of great convenience to the miners, I am assured at the Treasury Department it will cause no inconvenience to them.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, as explained by the gentleman from Massachusetts, the object of this bill simply is to make the provisions of existing law in reference to deposits of bullion for which coin certificates are issued applicable to the mints and to assay offices outside of the city of New York, so as to afford to the Pacific coast and to other places the same advantage and facilities under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Treasury which are now possessed in the city of New York.

The gentleman has also said it will involve no additional expense. On that point, however, I am somewhat apprehensive. The gentleman will remember, when this subject was under discussion in the last Congress, I was among those who advocated the passage of the bill which was then reported from his committee. I did so at that time under the expectation that in the reorganization of the assay offices of the United States there would be involved no additional expense on the part of the Government. On the contrary, we find that the expense of the assay office department alone is increased to $1,300,000 as against $400,000 before that law was passed. And I am somewhat apprehensive, therefore, that this proposed change in the existing law will involve additional expense.

We understand the miners and others who have bullion desire to have it turned into money without delay. When they make their deposits of bullion at the mints or the assay office they receive coin certificates; and these coin certificates operate as bills of exchange, upon which they can make their deposits in bank and receive currency or coin as they may choose.

Mr. HOOPER. This bill allows them to realize without delay the money for their deposits of bullion.

Mr. WOOD. It enables them to realize at once instead of being subjected to long delay until their deposits are coined and they receive the coin itself. These mints and assay offices are allowed to give them receipts, and those receipts are operative in the money markets of the world, in Europe as well as in this country, as equivalent to so much coin. Giving this power to the subordinates of the Treasury who have control of the coinage of this money, and letting them act ad libitum, grant this privilege at their own pleasure, is a matter in reference to which I have some doubt. Under proper control of a proper Secretary of the Treasury, who would exercise vigilance and give personal inspection to the exercise of this great power in the hands of his subordinates, probably it would work to the advantage of some persons upon the Pacific coast as well as elswhere; and if the gentleman will say that it will not involve any additional expense, and that the interest of the Government will be protected against a false issue of these certificates over and above the amount of bullion deposited, I might be satisfied to support the bill.

Mr. HOOPER. In regard to what the gentleman has stated of increase of expenses under the bill of last year, I would reply that that bill required all balances, profits of the mints and assay offices, to be paid into the Treasury. Previous to that time most of their expenses were paid out of the funds on hand. None of these balances were paid into the Treasury, and then no appropriation was required, or only a small one, for the purpose of carrying on our mints. At the present time all the balances are paid into the Treasury, and the expense of the mints are provided for by appropriation. And the salaries of the different officers and the wages of workmen are paid by regular appropriation.

Mr. WOOD. Is it that which causes this large increased expense?

Mr. HOOPER. That is what causes the apparent increase of expense, as the expenses are no longer paid out of the funds of the mint, out of the profits accruing. I see no reason for apprehension in regard to extending this bullion fund. It carries it only, as the mints now exist, to three assay offices. It would extend it to the mint at Carson City, which is used as an assay office, and to those at Boise City, Idaho, and Denver.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Do those officers give bonds?

Mr. HOOPER. The officers give bonds at all these mints and assay offices; and I believe myself that under this present law the mints and assay offices were never so well managed as they are now. I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOPER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ESTABLISHMENT OF ASSAY OFFICES.

Mr. HOUGHTON, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2877) to establish assay offices at Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri; at Chicago, in the State of Illinois; and at Helena, in the Territory of Montana; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to establish an assay office at Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri; at Chicago, in the State of Illinois; and at Helena, in the Territory of Montana; the said assay offices to be conducted under the provisions of an act entitled "An act revising and amending the law relative to the mints and assay offices and coinage of the United States," approved February 12, 1873.

The bill, in its second section, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to set aside such rooms, in the custom-house at Saint Louis, and in the custom-house at Chicago, for the use of said assay offices in those cities, as may be necessary for that purpose and not required for custom-house business, and to provide the said assay offices with the necessary fixtures and apparatus at a cost not exceeding $15,000 for each of said offices; and authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be constructed a suitable building at Helena, in the Territory of Montana, for the purpose of said assay office, and to provide the same with necessary fixtures and apparatus at a cost not exceeding $15,000.

Mr. SPEER. I raise the point of order that this bill contains an appropriation of money, and should have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I think the gentleman is in error in supposing that the bill is liable to the point of order. I think that a fair construction of this bill will show that it does not call for any direct appropriation of money. It simply provides for the establishment of these assay offices and limits the amount of money which they shall respectively cost. It makes no direct appropriation whatever.

Mr. SPEER. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to expend money.

The SPEAKER. The bill is clearly within the point of order. Under the old rule it would not have been, but the new rule was made specially for bills of this character. The bill requires an appropriation of money, and must go to the Committee of the Whole on the point of order being raised.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I hope the House will allow me to give a brief explanation of this bill. I would say to the House that the Territory of Montana, although one most isolated, is and has been our greatest gold-producing Territory. It has been organized ten years, and in those ten years it has produced $160,000,000 of gold and silver bullion, more than a million a month, and nearly enough to pay one-half of your greenbacks, and I believe that in the ten years to come it will produce enough to pay the rest. By the laws of the United States, and more than that, by the Constitution of the United States, every man that possesses or produces bullion is entitled to have it coined at a reasonable cost. But on all that magnificent contribution to the nation's wealth, the miners of Montana have had to pay from 4 to 5 per cent. to get their bullion to the Mint at Philadelphia, or the market at Wall street, New York. They have been obliged to pay to express companies 2½ per cent. to get their gold to the Mint, and often have had to pay in addition quite as much to get their greenbacks back in exchange, and this although they are as fairly entitled as any other citizens under the Constitution of the United States to reasonable facilities for converting that gold into coin.

We do not ask for any branch mint, although considering the amount of gold that we produce we might ask for that, but we do not; nor do we ask for any elaborate public buildings. All we want is that in the Territory which produces so much gold the Government shall put up the necessary machinery, so that the Government stamp can be put upon our bars, and that we may have some way of ascertaining their value.

Not only have our miners to stand this charge for the transportation of their treasure, and to risk the dangers of conveying it by lonely roads, often infested by banditti, but they are required to submit to the exactions of the gold-dust brokers who fix upon the gold-dust offered for sale such prices as they please; and at the private assay offices they are subjected to heavy charges, and sometimes complain that they do not get fair returns.

Mr. SPEER. Why does the gentleman not have a bill applying to Montana alone?

Mr. MAGINNIS. I did introduce such a bill, and would have liked the committee to report such a bill. This bill, so far as it relates to Montana, has passed the House three times. It has been considered in Committee of the Whole three times. It has passed the Senate twice. Once it failed through non-concurrence in a Senate amendment; and it failed in the last Congress because it reached the President too late for his signature. Secretary BOUTWELL has twice recommended it, Secretary Richardson has recommended it. And now, to have mints and assay offices in those Territories that do not produce nearly as much gold as the Territory of Montana does is an injustice to the people of that Territory, and makes a discrimination against them similar to what the case would be if there were custom-houses in Charleston, and New Orleans, and Portland, and Newport, and no custom-house at the principal port of entry of the country, at New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] desires unanimous consent that this bill on which the point of order has been raised may be allowed to have its consideration in the House.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I hope there will be no objection to that. This is a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. SPEER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects, and the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole House.

COINAGE ACT OF 1873.

Mr. HOOPER, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2878) to amend the twenty-fifth section of the act entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relative to the mint and assay offices and coinage of the United States," approved February 12, 1873; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It proposes to amend the coinage act of February 12, 1873, so that the twenty-fifth section thereof shall read as follows:

That no charge shall hereafter be made for the coinage of gold, and the charge for converting silver into trade dollars, for melting, for refining when bullion is below standard, for toughening when metals are contained in the bullion which render it unfit for coinage, for separating the gold and silver when those metals exist together in the bullion, and for the preparation of bars, shall be fixed from time to time by the Director of the Mint, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, so as to equal, but not exceed, in their judgment, the average cost at each mint and assay office of the material, labor, wastage, and use of machinery employed in each of the cases aforementioned.

Mr. HOOPER. The only change made by this amendment in the twenty-fifth section of the coinage act of 1873 is to strike out the charge for converting standard gold bullion into gold, which is now one-fifth of 1 per cent. This cuts off that charge of the mint.

Mr. RANDALL. Entirely?

Mr. HOOPER. Yes; for coinage.

Mr. RANDALL. Then we are to understand that the mints are in future to coin the bullion without cost to those who make the deposit of the bullion.

Mr. HOOPER. Without any charge for coinage; the depositors will still have to pay other expenses.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not asking these questions in any spirit of opposition to the bill, for I have long believed the policy of the Government should be to do what is provided for by this bill. It proposes what, I believe, is the English system.

Mr. HOOPER. This is the English system and that of most, if not all, the continental countries.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. How much does the Government now receive at its different mints from this source and which will be cut off if this bill passes?

Mr. HOOPER. From sixty to eighty thousand dollars a year.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. So that this will make a difference against the Government of from sixty to eighty thousand dollars a year?

Mr. HOOPER. Yes, sir, and a gain to the miner and a gain to the public and a gain in point of principle, because it makes the inducement stronger to coin gold in this country instead of sending it abroad to be coined.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. But undoubtedly next year, in keeping up the mint establishments, we shall be obliged to appropriate from sixty to eighty thousand dollars more for this branch of the public service than we do at present.

Mr. HOOPER. I should doubt if it would have precisely that effect, because the business of the Mint will be increased and the charges on the other operations, such as assaying, purifying, &c., I think would nearly make up the loss.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That must be something problematical.

Mr. RANDALL. That its effect will be to keep gold in the country is, however, almost a certain proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is the effect of this amendment that the coinage of gold is to be relieved of the charge of one-fifth of 1 per cent.?

Mr. HOOPER. That is all.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOPER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROMOTION OF NEW INVENTIONS.

Mr. CLEMENTS, from the Committee on Patents, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2512) to promote new and useful inventions in the United States.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the bill be read.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I now ask that the report be read.

CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, the House now resumes the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, after the long and exhaustive discussion that has been proceeding for three or four months both at this end of the Capitol and at the other, it is with great diffidence that I attempt to express here the ideas and opinions that I have myself formed after a careful examination of the financial questions now possessing so much interest for Congress and the country. Had any gentleman who has preceded me in the discussion of this important subject arrived at the same conclusions that I have myself reached, and had he presented them to the House and the country, I should have been content with that and should not myself have attempted to present them again.

We have had, sir, two classes of arguments from the various gentlemen who have given us their views on this subject. One class has been in favor of inflating the present currency of the country without regard to whether the additional amount which they desired to have issued of circulating notes had a fixed value and were convertible and redeemable or not; and another class has desired to resume specie payments without regard to the suffering caused to the country by the necessary contraction. In other words, we have had only two propositions before us; one for the resumption of specie payments by and through contraction, and the other an entire abandonment of any idea of return to a specie basis and the issue without limit of an irredeemable currency of greenbacks or national-bank notes.

I am one of the citizens of this country who feel a sense of humiliation that we should occupy the position that we now occupy. I believe it is perfectly practicable for us to get out of that condition and to resume specie payments in a very short time, and at the same time to have a circulating medium in this country to as large an amount as the most enthusiastic inflationist on this floor may think necessary. In other words, I believe it is entirely practicable to return to specie payments and at the same time increase the circulating medium of the country to the extent of $400,000,000, which I believe is as much as any gentleman on this floor thinks it necessary to increase it.

And I propose to do it, Mr. Speaker, in no untried way. I have no new experiment which I desire to ask Congress and the country to adopt. I am governed by what I find in the history of this and of every other country that has at any time been placed in the same position which we now occupy. I would not rob either the debtor or the creditor class; I would do neither of them injustice. I would not agree with my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHERWOOD,] whose speech is a very good illustration of the ideas entertained by gentlemen who look at this subject from his stand-point. I read from his remarks:

> The creditor class was robbed in 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865 through the necessities of war. But what can be the process to rob the debtor class in 1874, 1875, and 1876?

By inference, I suppose, the gentleman thinks that it is perfectly right that the creditor class should again be robbed, because they were robbed in the years which he mentioned. They probably have become used to it, and can bear it better than people who have never been subject to the infliction of that treatment.

He also gives us a medical illustration, to which I desire to call the attention of the House. He joins issue with gentlemen who desire to contract the currency for the purpose of reaching specie payments. He says that physicians do not prescribe bleeding for debility in patients when that debility has been caused by loss of blood. That is true, but there is an operation sometimes resorted to by physicians who have patients that are debilitated, in which operation the veins of the patients are opened and life-giving blood is injected therein. Did the gentleman ever hear of a physician proposing to open the veins of a debilitated patient, and to inject a large quantity of water therein for the purpose of strengthening that patient? Does he think that an operation of that kind would result in any benefit to him? If he does, I do not.

My friend from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS,] with whom to a great extent I agree, takes the opposite side. He would treat the patient not by injecting either blood or water, but, as my friend from Ohio indicates, he would draw from him a large portion of the blood which yet remains. He reminds me of the course of practice once advised by a man who was a professor of surgery in a medical college. It was at a time when the profession believed that consumption, or phthisis, was an inflammatory complaint. In lecturing to his class he said, "Gentlemen, phthisis is an inflammatory disease; when you have well-defined cases, and there is no mistake about the diagnosis, you will treat them with the utmost vigor upon the anti-phlogistic system; bleed them, and if that does not produce the desired result bleed them again, and continue to repeat the operation until the result is obtained?" The next day when he was propounding questions to the class in regard to the lecture of the day before, he asked one of the young gentlemen who had begun to believe that perhaps the old profession was in fault, what he would do in such a case. Said he, "Mr. Perkins, if you had a well-defined case of phthisis, how would you treat it?" Said the student to whom the inquiry had been addressed, "I would bleed him, and if he ever got over it, I would bleed him again." That is the way my friend from New Jersey would treat the patient.

I am in favor of a return to specie payments at the earliest possible moment; but I am not in favor of contraction. I believe we have twice in our country, when the circumstances were not so favorable as are the circumstances which now surround us, returned to specie payments, not only without contraction, but by adding largely to the volume of the currency. We can best judge of the present and future by properly studying what has occurred in the past.

In coming to the examination of this question, as a business man who feels in himself and the interests with which he is connected the circumstances now depressing the country, there are two or three ideas which I believe will meet with a general acceptance on the part of the members of this House. I do not believe that any man can say that they are not founded upon truth and experience.

First. In regard to the amount of the circulating medium, it is necessary that every community should have a sufficient amount of currency to enable all necessary or desirable business to be transacted conveniently, and all operations involving an interchangeability of products and commodities to be performed rapidly and easily; and every individual in such community who has earned or acquired visible property which he holds in his own right should be able at all times to obtain an amount of money bearing a reasonable proportion to the amount of property he is able to pledge for the repayment of the loan, which he ought to be able to obtain at a low rate of interest. This principle laid down by the great writers on finance will not be denied or attempted to be controverted by any gentleman on this floor.

Secondly. I believe we ought to experience no practical difficulty in now returning to a specie basis. I believe that a nation which can float $2,000,000,000 of indebtedness and have the evidence of that indebtedness better than gold at home and abroad, can float $1,000,000,000 of currency and have it as good as gold at home and abroad.

Sir, I believe that no nation that has ever had a place in history, no nation that to-day exists on the face of the earth, has ever issued its notes as money, and made them legal tender by law, without getting into precisely the position we are occupying to-day; and, sir, no nation on earth, our own or any other, has ever permanently recovered from that condition, except in one way. I challenge any gentleman on the floor to point out in the history of the world one exception to this general statement. How has that been done? It has been done by the establishment of one grand, powerful institution that has united in itself the power and the influence of the Government with the credit and the capital of the country; never in any other way, and always in that.

Now, sir, the history of our country has not covered a very long period of time; it is all comprised within one hundred years, and I propose as rapidly as possible within the time allowed me to ask gentlemen who do me the honor to listen on this occasion to run with me over the financial history of the United States to see whether we cannot find somewhere in the past some wise principle that will point clearly to a way by which we may emerge from the difficulties that are now surrounding us. Going back to the period of the revolutionary war, we find that the very first glimmer of hope, the first chance of success that our forefathers had in that contest, came after they had recognized the principle which I have stated, and after they had taken the Bank of North America with its small capital of $400,000 and made it a national institution, obtaining in that way the notes and the credit which enabled them to carry the revolutionary war to a successful termination. I have not time to more than allude to this subject. I simply call the attention of the House to an extract which I find in Sparks's Life of Gouverneur Morris, alluding to the occasion in which that distinguished financier took a very important part:

> This bank had an extraordinary effect in restoring public and private credit in the country, and was of immense utility in aiding the future operations of the financier, although it was begun with the small capital of $400,000.—Sparks's Life of Gouverneur Morris, volume 1, page 235.

We emerged from the revolutionary war, and the First Congress under the present Constitution met in the city of Philadelphia, with George Washington, the Father of his Country, occupying the presidential chair, with Jefferson as Secretary of State, Edmund Randolph as Attorney-General, and Alexander Hamilton, the greatest of our financiers, Secretary of the Treasury. The country was in a worse condition than we are in to-day. We had currency enough in the country, precisely such currency as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] would have us issue now. He would do as I once heard a man in my own State say he thought this country ought to do. He said he would not belong to any party that went for taxing the people; that he did not want any taxes. He was asked how he would pay the expenses of the Government without taxes; and he replied, "I would pay the expenses of the Government out of the Treasury of the United States." So with my friend from Massachusetts. He would start the printing-presses in the Treasury Department and would pay the expenses of the Government out of the Treasury. In that way he would relieve us from the terrible burden of taxation. By precisely that process we had a currency at that day. There was no complaint that the quantity was not sufficient. Almost every house in the country had a barrelful of it in its garret. That currency was like the greenback of to-day, and it had at the back of it all the property and all the credit of the United States. But, sir, it was worthless; it could not be used as money. All the real money the people had was the small quantity of gold and silver in circulation at that time.

How did the statesmen of that day meet the question forced upon their early consideration? They met it by the establishment of the first Bank of the United States after an exhaustive discussion in both Houses of Congress. There were two classes of men at that day who were opposed to the establishment of this bank. There were two arguments, and only two, adduced against it—one by men who believed in having only gold and silver as a circulating medium, in having no bank-notes at all; the other by a class who opposed the measure because they said it was unconstitutional, that there was no warrant in the Constitution for the establishment by Congress of any such institution. In the debate on that question, which continued longer than the present debate has yet extended, a gentleman, alluding to the Bank of North America, said that by the establishment of that bank was recognized for the first time the principle of uniting the credit and capital of the country with the power and influence of the Government; and that measure was the most powerful of the operating causes which gave us the first dawn that led to the full meridian splendor which culminated in the freedom and prosperity of the whole United States.

The Congress of the United States passed a bill to charter the first Bank of the United States, with a capital of $10,000,000; one quarter of which the Government of the United States subscribed for and took. At once, sir, we had a return to specie payments; we had a return of prosperity, and for twenty years, without an exception, during the continuance of that first Bank of the United States, we had a currency which was as good as gold at home or abroad. We had specie payments; we had prosperous business; we grew in population; we grew in wealth; we grew in resources; we paid our national debt; and during the whole time commanded the respect of the world and of our own people.

When the question of signing that bill was presented to President Washington, he referred it, as to its constitutionality and advisability, to his advisors of the cabinet. He asked Mr. Jefferson, his Secretary of State, and Mr. Randolph, his Attorney-General, and Mr. Hamilton, his Secretary of the Treasury, to give him their opinions as to whether he should approve or veto the bill. Mr. Jefferson wrote a strong and exhaustive paper against it. Mr. Randolph gave his opinion against it because of its unconstitutionality and its inadvisability. Mr. Hamilton alone of all the advisers of the President, took strong ground in favor of it, and his argument prevailed, and Washington signed the bill and it became a law.

Daniel Webster, the great statesman, in his eulogy of Alexander Hamilton, described the effect of the establishment of this first Bank of the United States. He said:

> He smote the barren rock of public credit and out gushed the living waters. He touched the dead corpse of public credit, and it sprung upon its feet.

As I have previously stated, for twenty years after the establishment of that bank, we had the condition of things which I have described to the House, and which is a part of the history of our country.

But, Mr. Speaker, in 1811 when the charter of this bank was about expiring, after a long and exhaustive discussion of the advisability of rechartering the bank, Congress refused to pass the bill to recharter it, and the bank expired by its own limitation.

What did we do between the years 1811 and 1816? State banks were established in every part of the United States. The currency was inflated to the extent of the circulation of these State banks. We went through the war of 1812 borrowing money. The Government of the United States borrowed money to carry on that war at from 35 to 40 per cent. discount on the bonds issued. We came out of that war in a worse condition than we are in to-day. Our currency was depreciated to a greater extent than it is now, and all the industries of the country were lying prostrate.

How did we get out of that condition of things? After another long and exhaustive discussion, lasting several months, Mr. Madison being President and Alexander J. Dallas Secretary of the Treasury, Congress chartered the second Bank of the United States, with a capital of $35,000,000, one-fourth of which was subscribed and taken by the United States Government. Precisely the same consequences that followed the establishment of the first Bank of the United States followed the establishment of the second, and for twenty years more, under the operations of that institution, we had a stable currency in this country. We had a condition of prosperity never exceeded. We had no panic; we had no suspension. We had all over the United States the revenues of the country collected cheaply and disbursed without expense. Our exchanges were carried on in the interest and not against the Treasury of the United States.

In 1833, when this condition of prosperity existed all over the country, the question of rechartering the Bank of the United States came up in Congress, and after discussion lasting almost the entire session, after hearing the report of the committee appointed for the purpose of examining the management of the bank, Congress passed a bill rechartering for twenty years more the second Bank of the United States. Andrew Jackson, then President, vetoed that bill. His Secretary of the Treasury, William J. Duane, refusing to carry out the policy of the President, he appointed Roger B. Taney as Secretary of the Treasury, and under executive direction Mr. Taney withdrew from the Bank of the United States and all its branches the deposits of the Government and placed them in State banks selected in different parts of the Union.

When these deposits were placed with State banks, they were placed there with the suggestion on the part of the Secretary that they should be as liberal as possible in their discounts, a suggestion to which they were only too ready to accede. What followed? State banks were established all over the United States with wonderful rapidity. Our discounts extended from 1833, when they were $234,000,000, until in 1837 they amounted to $570,000,000. There was a condition of fictitious prosperity in the country. Everybody seemed to be getting rich. Everybody seemed to be happy. The speculation of that day took the form of purchasing western lands, and the result was that the money of the State banks flowed into the Treasury as proceeds of these sales in very large amounts. When Andrew Jackson left the presidential chair in 1837, he congratulated the people of the country on the magnificent success of his policy, and the grand results which had followed his carrying it out in the manner in which he had. "I leave," he says, "this great people prosperous and happy." Why he had hardly got out of Washington when the crash came; he had hardly got out of his seat when there came the panic of 1837 and the suspension of that year, and the consequent depression of all the business interests of the country; that terrible panic, which has never been equaled in our day, and which is in the memory of many gentlemen now in this Congress from their personal recollection.

Sir, what happened then? The process of contraction commenced, and when we had contracted to within a few millions of where we started in 1833 we had specie resumption again. And the process began to be again repeated. They began again to establish State banks in every part of the United States, until in 1842, when the machine had become inflated to the greatest extent it could possibly bear, again we had a panic and suspension. We contracted again, and resumed, and went on until 1857. And then we had reached the point of inflation again beyond which it seems impossible to go, and we had panic and suspension and poverty and distress all over the United States. Well, sir, we got over 1857 in the same way, by contraction of the severest kind, and we resumed specie payments again; and we went on to 1862, when we suspended again, and we have been in suspension ever since.

Now, sir, I think that this rapid review of the financial history of this country shows beyond the possibility of question or doubt that we have never in our history departed from specie payments, but it has had to be followed either by severe contraction, which has always been resorted to except in the two instances I have mentioned, or else by the establishment of such an institution as we had in the first and second banks of the United States of America.

Gentlemen say that we cannot establish a bank of that kind to-day; that the people will not permit such a huge monopoly to be established in our midst. But I find no gentleman who says that for himself. It is merely that somebody else will not permit it. And I think with the fact staring us in the face that one official has absolute control over two thousand national banks in the country, and another has had $44,000,000, a greater amount than the capital of the second Bank of the United States, at his absolute disposal to pay out and take in during the last six years, I think, in the face of this condition of things, that argument has no force whatever. And the arguments that were used against the old banks of the United States when they were established can have no force to-day. There are no advocates of the theory that there should be no circulating medium but gold, nor do I suppose there is one man who believes that Congress has not the constitutional power to establish such an institution.

Now, sir, I will not take up the time of the House, or use the limited time to which I am confined, by attempting to give the financial history of the other nations of the world. I suppose it to be as familiar to every gentleman who has given this subject any attention at all as it is to myself. I would simply call attention to the fact that we have had in the Bank of England an illustration of the manner in which an institution of the kind I propose works in that country. We have in the Bank of France another illustration. Every gentleman within reach of my voice knows that that bank, established to rescue France from a condition similar to that in which we are to-day, has carried France through a terrible war; and there was no period during that war that bills of the Bank of France would not bring within 1 per cent. of their par value in gold, and the Bank of France was ready at any time to pay its bills with gold over the counter when they were presented for redemption. It never suspended specie payment.

I have heard it stated in the course of this debate by several gentlemen of intelligence that the Bank of England has frequently within the last few years suspended specie payments. I say there has been no period since 1822 when a note of the Bank of England was not equal in value to gold. There has been no period since 1822 when a note of the Bank of England presented at its counter would not bring specie for its full value. At no time since that year has specie payment been suspended.

The bank which I ask Congress to establish by the bill which I have had the honor to present to Congress, and which is now before the Committee on Banking and Currency, (H. R. No. 1424,) for the establishment of an exchequer, is founded upon the principle of the old United States Bank, adopting the great feature of the Bank of England which combines in it two departments, the department of issue and the department of banking. I desire to call the attention of the members of this House to the bill, and my object will have been accomplished if I can induce members to look at the subject, to take up that bill and examine it in the light of the facts which I shall endeavor to present. I do not desire to antagonize the bill which has been presented to the House by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

I am in favor of free-banking as I understand it. I am in favor of letting men in any section of this country who have bonds of the Government, take those bonds, and, if they can make anything on circulation based on those bonds under a law carefully guarded and extended over them, I have no objection to their inflating the currency to any extent that the demands of the country warrant, provided they will have that currency based on a sound and substantial basis. The national bank currency of to-day is upon that basis, and were it not for the fact that it is only redeemable in greenbacks, it would be to-day as good as gold.

Sir, when a man holds in his hand a note of a national bank what has he got? He has, first, an evidence of a debt due to the bank. He knows that when the bank sent that bill out from its coffers its repayment at some specified time was secured by deposits in the bank as security of good mercantile paper, or some other satisfactory collaterals; and he knows that in case that fails to be available to meet the debt there is back of it bonds of the United States for 10 per cent. more than its face value, and those bonds are to-day better than gold.

Now, why is not that note as good as gold? It would be except for this fact that the holder knows that if he goes to the bank that issues the note and demands that it shall be redeemed, all he can compel the bank to give him for the note is a legal-tender note, which is not as good as gold, and never can or will be.

On the other hand, when he holds a ten-dollar legal-tender note in his hand, what has he got? He has simply an evidence of a debt due by the Government; when the Government paid it out they had nothing else; they could not pay their debts or obligations in any other way, and were compelled to give the holder of that note, or the person from whom he received it, an irresponsible, irredeemable note in payment of a just claim due by the Government. It is not payable anywhere on demand or at any specified date.

What is true of an individual is, in a larger sense, true of the Government, which is only an aggregation of individuals. There is precisely the same difference between a national-bank note or a legal-tender note and a bond payable at a certain time, that there is between two notes that may be given by an individual who is known to be responsible in the community in which he lives. Take for example A. T. Stewart, of New York, and I suppose any banker in New York would consider his note good for $500. But suppose a man presents himself at a bank with two notes signed by A. T. Stewart, one of which reads as follows: "Sixty days after date, for value received, I promise to pay John Smith or order, $500 dollars with interest, negotiable and payable at the Park National Bank, of New York;" and another note, also signed by A. T. Stewart, reading: "Some time or other when it is perfectly convenient and I have nothing else to do with my means, I will pay the man who happens to hold this note, $500;" which of those notes would the banker to whom they were presented give most for? And so it is precisely with the people in regard to the national-bank notes and the greenbacks. They may not stop to reason it out; they may not know why they are not willing to receive greenbacks at par; but if they do reason it out they will find that the difficulty lies where I have stated it, and that the analogy holds good between the Government and the individual.

Now, I have stated that I believe it is perfectly possible and practicable for us, through the establishment of a sound national system of this kind, to return to specie payments, and, at the same time, largely increase the loanable means of the country. I hold in my hand a statement in regard to the comparative amounts of circulation and loans of the banks of Europe and their capital as compared with the loans and discounts made by the national banks of our country and their capital. I find that the five chief European banks, operating with the countenance and support of their governments, the banks of England, France, Russia, Belgium, and the Netherlands, show an aggregate capital of about $376,000,000; discounts to individuals, $725,000,000; government bonds and advances, $400,000,000; and circulation at par, $1,250,000,000; while under our defective system of national banks the figures show that their capital is $421,072,656; individual loans, $944,220,116.34; Government bonds, $411,960,250; circulation, $339,081,799, at a discount to-day of 13½ per cent.

These foreign banks, it will be perceived, with a capital of only $350,000,000 have a circulation at par with gold the world over of $1,250,000,000, or a little more than four and a half times their entire capital. Our two thousand national banks, by the statement of the Comptroller of the Currency of the past year, have a capital of $490,000,000 and a circulation of only $340,000,000, or $150,000,000 less than the amount of their capital, which circulation is at a discount below gold of 13½ per cent. and every day changing.

The European banks lend to individuals and to governments nearly four and a half times the amount of their capital. Our banks lend less than twice their capital to individuals. Now, a consideration of these facts will show that the European banks loan to the people of the countries in which they exist three times as much in proportion to their capital as our national banks loan to the people of this country. And they maintain at par the circulation upon which they make those loans, while we in this country, with one-third less in proportion of discounts, are unable to maintain our circulation at par, but it is continually changing and fluctuating in the markets of the country and of the world.

Now I propose, as briefly as possible, to explain the provisions of a bill which I hope the Committee on Banking and Currency may see fit to report favorably at some future day, after Congress has adopted the bill which they have already reported, or something else which we hope may reach the desired result.

My proposition is this: that there may be incorporated a bank with a capital of $100,000,000. I do not wish to have it interfere in any way, shape, or manner with the national banks of the United States as at present organized. I do not propose to have it interfere with the free-banking institutions that may be inaugurated under the operation of a free-banking law, should Congress pass one. I believe that it will work in entire harmony with those banks, and will work very much better with our present system of national banks than the old Bank of the United States worked with the State banks then in existence. I believe it can be made to carry out and perform very important functions in connection with our national banks. It may be made to take the place, in relation to the national banks of the country, that the old Suffolk Bank of Massachusetts occupied in the history of the banks of that State, when it was the redemption agent of every sound bank in the New England States. I would, however, permit the national banks to receive the reserved 10 per cent. of circulation now withheld, and give them an amount of currency equal to the amount of bonds deposited. This would add forty millions to our circulation. I would also release them from the requirement of hol ding a reserve on their circulation.

The bill I propose provides for the incorporation by Congress of a national bank to be known as the Exchequer of the United States of America, with a capital of $100,000,000, in shares of $1,000 each, of which the United States shall subscribe one-fourth; that the chief office shall be in New York, with branches at Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, (South Carolina,) Savannah, Mobile, New Orleans, Memphis, Galveston, Saint Louis, Louisville, Cincinnati, Chicago, San Francisco, Portland, Richmond, (Virginia,) and such other points as may hereafter be determined upon, with an equitable distribution of the capital; that books of subscription shall be opened at such time as may be designated by the corporators at all of the principal cities of the country, under the supervision of three commissioners at each point, who shall be appointed by the corporators, the subscriptions to be paid three-fourths in legal-tender notes and one-fourth in coin of the United States, 10 per cent. to be paid at the time of making the subscription; that if after said books have been open a certain number of days the whole capital has not been subscribed, then any national bank now existing may subscribe upon the same terms the whole or any part of its capital, and consolidate and become merged into this corporation; provided that it thereby abandons its present organization and winds up its present existence, and its owners accept in lieu of their present shares in any such bank shares in this corporation of equal value. If more than one thousand shares are subscribed for upon the terms mentioned, then the number of shares to be divided pro rata among the subscribers. After thirty days' notice the stockholders shall meet in New York and elect a board of nine managers for the chief office in New York, and five for each branch, each share voting one vote. The board for the chief office shall elect the governor thereof, and the board for each branch to elect the governor thereof, each to hold office for one year.

The corporation thus created shall be divided into two departments, the one for the business of banking exclusively, including the discount of negotiable notes, bills of exchange, drafts, and other evidences of debt limited to twice the amount of the capital, except upon obligations of the Government of the United States, and to ½ of 1 per cent. per month as the rate of interest for thirty days; the other department shall be the issue department, which shall consist of three commissioners for each branch and the chief office, one appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, one by the governor of the State in which the office is located, and one appointed by the governor and managers of the office or branch for which he shall act; these commissioners to give such bond and security as the proprietors shall name. Whenever the banking department shall deliver gold coin of the United States to the extent of one-fourth of the amount required and the other three-fourths in the bonds of the United States bearing 4 per cent. interest, the commissioners of the issue department shall issue to the governor and board of managers of the banking department an equal sum in exchequer notes until the issue shall in the aggregate reach the sum of $200,000,000. After notes to this amount have been issued the commissioners of the issue department shall require one dollar in gold and two in United States bonds bearing 4 per cent. interest for every three dollars of notes issued above $200,000,000, until the sum of $400,000,000 shall have been issued; for the next $200,000,000 to be issued in notes the proportion must be half gold and half bonds; and if any more issues shall be made after reaching $600,000,000 there shall be one dollar in gold paid in to the issue department for every dollar of exchequer notes issued to the banking department.

Each note issued shall be for five dollars or some multiple thereof, and shall be a legal tender at any of the branches for all debts due the exchequer, and redeemable in gold at the chief office in New York, or at the branch where issued, and if not so paid when presented shall work a forfeiture of all the rights and privileges granted by the act of incorporation. The exchequer is not allowed to pay any interest on deposits or other evidences of debt. Loans may be negotiated for any of the States; but the charge for so doing may not exceed one-fourth of 1 per cent., and the Government of the United States may at any time sell through the exchequer any of its obligations or redeem them; but no charge shall be made for any sale, redemption, or transfers of credits or moneys of the United States so long as the deposits and disbursements of that Government is made through the exchequer.

Whenever the exchequer shall deliver legal-tender notes of the United States stamped "Canceled by the exchequer," or pass to the credit of the United States, payable in coin or exchequer notes at the option of the Government creditor, an amount not less than $——— at any one time, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver 4 per cent. bonds of the Government for a like amount, provided the aggregate does not exceed $———, and if the bonds are not previously sold by the Secretary.

These are the main provisions of the bill. The minor details will be found in the bill itself, which I hope may be carefully examined by members of both the Senate and House.

Mr. Speaker, the accomplishment of two objects is absolutely essential to perfect relief from our present embarrassments. First, an increase of the loanable means of the country. Secondly, to improve our currency so that it may be on a par with specie at home and abroad. The exchequer will do both, as a similar corporation has twice in our history accomplished these ends under more unfavorable circumstances than those by which we are now surrounded. I do not hope to convince this Congress of the necessity of this measure, certainly not until after the fall elections; but that sooner or later it will be adopted I believe as firmly as I believe you and I are now living. We must return to the only correct principle which has never failed to give nations adopting it financial prosperity—a sound currency and substantial credit—and which has never been departed from without being followed by frequently recurring panics, depreciated currency, disturbance and uncertainty to the business of the nation, and poverty and distress among the people.

I will not now longer occupy the time of the House. When this subject comes properly before it for discussion I shall have more to say; for the present I am content if I have said enough to induce gentlemen who have listened to me so kindly to give it a careful examination, as I have done in the light of the experience of the past, confident that if they will do so history, precedent, and facts will point them irresistably to the conclusions I have myself reached. If any of the time allotted me remains I yield it to the gentlemen from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, how much of the gentleman's hour remains?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, in the chair.) Fifteen minutes.

Mr. BECK. I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has half an hour remaining, of which he was to give me a portion. As the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] has been kind enough to give me the remainder of his time, I would like to have added to it whatever time the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be inclined to grant me.

Mr. RANDALL. My understanding was that I was entitled to thirty minutes immediately following the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, I having yielded thirty minutes so as to give that gentleman an opportunity to come in. I understood this morning, however, from the Speaker that he had made a different assignment. Of course I would claim my thirty minutes now, if I am entitled to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair does not know anything about the arrangement that the Speaker may have made.

Mr. BECK. My only reason for raising the question was that I would be obliged to hurry on much more rapidly if restricted to fifteen minutes than if I could have some of the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER, (Mr. BLAINE having resumed the chair.) The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman from Virginia, whose hour has not expired, has yielded to me fifteen minutes; and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield a portion of his time——.

The SPEAKER. That would disturb the entire arrangement of the floor for to-day. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] will reserve his fifteen minutes to be added to his time to-morrow, the Chair can make an arrangement for him.

Mr. BECK. I would greatly prefer that if it can be done.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can arrange that for the gentleman.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Speaker, having had the honor to serve upon the Committee on Banking and Currency during the Forty-second Congress, I have been kindly permitted to occupy a few moments in explaining my position in regard to this measure.

I shall give my vote for those sections of this bill which remove the limitations now imposed upon the amount of currency which may be issued under the conditions of the banking law, which repeal that portion of the act that requires a reserve to be kept on account of circulation, and which provide a system of practical redemption in Treasury notes.

But while I am in favor of free banking, I do not advocate this measure because I believe that anything but gold can be made the standard of value. I not only admit but heartily indorse all that has been said in regard to the importance and indispensableness of this standard. I do not say that nothing can ever be discovered which could take the place of gold as a measure of value, but it is evident that no such thing ever has been discovered, nor, so far as we can see, is likely to be. Whatever mediums of exchange any race may have employed, whether cattle, cloth, beads, feathers, shells, wampum, ivory, iron, or copper, all have been at once thrown aside when gold has been discovered. Indeed, the suitableness of gold for this use is as strictly providential, and carries with it as striking evidence of design, as most of the facts about us which are commonly quoted as belonging to that class. The uniformity of the relation of supply to demand has of itself been most remarkable. Upon the discovery of new mines which yielded gold in great abundance the prices of commodities have at times been increased; but this result has been local, or at most temporary, so that there has been but slight derangement to the business of the world from this cause. This steadiness in the relation of the supply of the precious metals to the wants of trade has been such as to attract the attention of nearly all writers upon political economy.

Then, in addition to these facts, we consider the other valuable properties of gold, when we remember—and remember is the only word that we of this decade can properly employ—when we remember that it is durable, incorruptible, readily divisible and beautiful, and that it has great value in small compass, we see how superior it is to everything else as a medium of exchange. I do not belong to that school who hold that paper can take the place of gold as a standard of value. I do not believe that the usefulness of gold for this purpose is found wholly in the stamp imprinted upon it by the Government, nor that such a stamp upon paper can make it answer the uses of gold. Paper may properly be employed as currency; all the most civilized nations use it as such, but none of them use it as the standard of value. Paper is never supposed to be, properly speaking, money, but only a promise to pay money. We may enact a thousand times that paper is money and gold is not, but the laws of nature will still assert themselves. Paper has real value only so far as it represents gold, and to this standard finally all come—all producers, all merchants, all business men of all nations—to test the value of their commodities and of all their possessions. Hence, I do not think that the present condition of our currency is a normal or desirable one. We must ultimately return to the true standard, and we shall be liable to great and hurtful fluctuations in business until we do.

But while my confidence in these principles remains unshaken, I cannot vote for any attempt at resumption in the present Congress. This will strike many of you as very illogical. You will say, why advocate sound principles and then refuse to follow them to their logical consequences? This criticism would be unanswerable if the soundness of the principles of which I have spoken were the only thing to be taken into the account in reasoning upon this subject. We are also compelled to consider the safety of applying them to present conditions. You say to me, "You admit that the patient is afflicted with a tumor which is eating every day nearer to the sources of life. Delay is dangerous. Let the surgeon's knife be applied at once." I reply, must this be done without reference to the question whether the patient is fatigued from unusual exertion, or worn out from want of rest, or feverish from excitement? May there not be an unpropitious as well as a propitious time for strong remedies? Will not the wise surgeon choose the favorable hour when the constitution of the patient is in the best condition to endure and to resist? As regards our financial condition, there has not been in many years a time so unfavorable for enforced contraction of the currency. The panic of last autumn, and the unsettled state of confidence resulting from it; the feeling of uncertainty and uneasiness existing so generally; the common impression in many States of the Union, whether right or wrong, that they have not enough currency to meet the demands of business; the wide-spread restlessness among laborers during the past winter, and the want of employment and the destitution among many thousands of them; the painful apprehension in commercial circles that we may soon experience another season of scarcity in the money market—all these facts make it plain to me that any attempt of the present Congress to commence a system of contraction would produce general alarm and would ruin half the business men of the country. Men who are already rich, who have no debts to pay, whose lives are principally occupied with the agreeable duties of collecting rents from real estate, receiving interest upon Government bonds, dividends from railway stocks, and interest upon notes secured by mortgage, naturally look with no apprehension upon a policy which would enhance by a large percentage the value of their incomes. But the man who has embarrassing obligations upon him, who is in doubt how he shall make the ends meet at the close of the year; the young man who, without fortune, is just setting out in life; the man who is engaging in business with small capital—all these classes dread, as they never did before, any legislation in this body favoring contraction. But you will say, these classes are unduly alarmed; they are not properly enlightened; they are not philosophers. There may be some truth in this, but the stubborn fact remains, which statesmanship cannot overlook, that they constitute the great body of our business men, that their prosperity or their ruin is the prosperity or ruin of our financial condition, and that confidence and a sense of security on their part is essential to the success of the industries in which they are engaged. Surely we cannot afford to despise the wishes, the solicitudes, the prejudices even, of the great body of the people. I have the impression that even the advocates of redemption feel the force of these considerations, and are not, for the most part, disposed to press plans for contraction upon the House at the present session.

Evidently the proper thing for us to do at this session of Congress is not to inaugurate a new system in regard to our currency, but to make the best of the system we have. We should not attempt contraction nor to authorize any considerable expansion, but to remove such objections and inequalities as stand in the way of success. In a word, without making any radical changes we should endeavor to put our system of currency into such form as is fairest and most presentable, and will best command general confidence. The faith of the people in the financial policy of the Government is the most important single condition of its success.

I have time only to enumerate some of the reasons which commend a free-banking law to our favor as likely to answer the purposes named.

1. In the first place, this bill abolishes a monopoly which is odious to a large portion of the people. The limitation upon the amount of bank-note currency has been a fruitful cause of irritation in the South and West, and has been spoken of as confining the advantages of banking to a favored class. There is no doubt some unreasoning prejudice in this hostile feeling, but it is a most desirable thing to have it removed, unless it be thought an advantage that our banking system should be unpopular. I will venture to say that no friend of this system has addressed political assemblies in the West without finding it necessary to apologize for that feature of it which limits the enjoyment of its advantages. I shall vote, then, for free banking for this reason, among others, that it offers its benefits to all alike who are prepared to comply with the conditions of the banking law.

2. Again, I am in favor of this bill because it prepares the way for equalizing the distribution of currency over the whole country. From the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency we learn that the West and South have less than their share of bank-notes, upon a basis of wealth and population, by about $80,000,000. The law of July 12, 1870, undertook to remedy in part this inequality. This law requires the removal of twenty-five millions of currency from the East to those States where there is a deficiency. This removal has always been objected to in the East, and has been pronounced by the Comptroller, in one of his reports, to be nearly impracticable. To meet this difficulty I introduced into the last Congress a bill to give the States of the West and South twenty-five millions of new currency, and to repeal that section of the law which requires the withdrawal of that amount from the States having more than their proportion. Had that bill become a law, I thought then, and still think, it would have gone very far toward satisfying the demand for additional currency in the West. It met a generous support from this House, but not much of this came from the East, and during this session a paper has been laid upon our desks, signed by a large number of prominent bankers in that section, protesting earnestly against the removal of any portion of their currency. These facts have been the cause of some irritation of feeling in those sections where the deficiency exists. The fact that the law gives the people of those States twenty-five millions of currency which they cannot obtain, and which is tenaciously retained elsewhere, has no doubt had the effect to intensify their desire to secure it, and to produce an exaggerated estimate of its importance to their prosperity. Now, the bill before us removes at once all grounds for complaint of this kind, by offering freely to all sections all the currency which they desire to receive, upon the conditions provided by law.

3. I remark again, what I had nearly anticipated, that the very fact that this bill meets a demand of the people is of itself a reason in its favor. A desire to meet the wishes of the people is not demagogism. To satisfy such wishes is in itself most desirable. If the Government is always in need of the approval of the people it is never more so than in questions of finance, where the confidence of the public is the very ground of success.

4. I add one consideration more, which, if duly weighed would, I believe, remove the gravest objections that are urged against this bill. I have long been convinced that the passage of a law for free banking would not considerably enlarge the volume of our currency; that it would not enlarge it to such an extent as to be sensibly felt in the increase of prices. It has become evident of late that the business of banking, under the law of Congress, is no longer so profitable, as compared with other modes of investment, as to offer any very strong inducement, except in certain localities, to enlarge the number of banks. Members of the House must have been convinced of this who listened a few days since to the clear statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRIAM] who is a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, showing how moderate a profit can be made from its currency by any honestly conducted bank after meeting the obligations imposed on it by law. The opinion is often expressed among sound business men of my own State that banking is not so remunerative as some other departments of business, and the Comptroller of the Currency will inform you that several banks have already gone into liquidation in order to find more profitable employment for their capital. Under these circumstances I have little fear of unwholesome expansion from free banking. There are towns here and there in the West and South where additional banking facilities would be a great advantage, and most of these towns would at once secure them. But the demand for new bank charters would not be general, and many communities which now feel aggrieved in not being allowed more currency would, on further examination, decline to accept it when freely offered. Many members of Congress are aware of the fact that it has not been uncommon during the past two years for the people of some thriving western town to petition earnestly for an additional bank, and when finally successful to decline to organize it, after experiencing the difficulty of raising, for example, $110,000 in cash to buy the bonds to be deposited as security for only ninety thousand in currency, and after becoming more thoroughly acquainted with the burdens and sharp limitations of the banking law. And it is no small advantage to have such a community discover where the difficulty really lies: that it is not in the Government, not in an oppressive monopoly, but in their own circumstances. The American people dislike to be told that they cannot have some advantage which others enjoy. They prefer to decide the question of possession for themselves; and the removal by the Government of all causes of disquiet from this source will always find abundant reward in the increased contentment, confidence, and consequent prosperity of the people. Let us remove all occasion of complaint in regard to currency by the passage of this bill, and we shall soon discover that while a few localities will gladly and profitably avail themselves of its provisions, most communities will discover that they have already as much bank-note currency as their business demands or they can profitably employ.

We have already voted to legalize the issue of $400,000,000 of Treasury notes. If we pass this bill the volume of bank-note currency may in time enlarge to the same amount. This aggregate of currency would, I believe, prove to be all that the business of the country demands, without sensibly affecting the prices of commodities. In other words, we should have only such moderate expansion as would remove the objections and inequalities of which I have spoken, and restore that general confidence which would be the basis of renewed prosperity, and finally, at a more favorable time, of a return to specie payments.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, he discussion upon this bill, as well as that to legalize and declare the limit of our currency at four hundred millions of greenbacks, involves the whole circle of our fiscal affairs. It is vindicated here by the stringency of the times and of the Treasury. It involves our own income and outgo, as a people and as individuals; for it involves the contraction and expansion of our medium of exchange.

1858 AND 1874—ENGLISH AND AMERICAN ECONOMY.

In 1858, while debating the budget of that year, when our expenditures were not eighty millions, I had occasion to refer to English taxation. It was compared with our own. I quoted Mr. Bright, who said then that England raised £50,000,000 sterling more than the same number of people in the United States. I adverted to the attractive forces of our economy; and asked the House to protest where they would not lop off, so as to secure the greatest saving with the least harm to just administration.

What a change, sir, since then. Now we outvie England in our expenditures. With all our resources, and in time of peace, our strong-box sounds hollow. Our credit is a mendicant. Look now at our rival! Mr. Gladstone recently dissolved Parliament, and his ministers boasted that by lessening taxes he increased the revenue. This, a gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] when I mentioned it the other week, could not comprehend. But even that thrifty virtue did not save the ministry. A premier goes to the country and is beaten even with a surplus of five millions sterling, while we are groaning under deficiencies, miscellaneous funded debts, bad currencies, heavy taxes, paralyzed industries, and wasteful discredit. What then would be the fate of our Administration if it went to an intelligent country on the additional issue of irredeemable paper? Such issues are the fraud of the land—the swindle of ages. They have no defense in literature or science. Not a writer in Europe would hazard his name by apologizing for such economy; and yet the Secretary of the Treasury makes it a necessity, as if we were in war, of slipping out of the Treasury increased millions, forever withdrawn and canceled, of this same sort of printed unveracity and robbery; and the Committee on Ways and Means unanimously presents a bill, which the House passes, to sanction his conduct.

DISTRUST OF LEGISLATION.

Both Houses of Congress, after the most painstaking discussion of the history and effect of inflation, deliberately authorized the reissue of the forty-four millions, and relapsed into that barbarism which would create more paper symbols without real values. And this is to be provident for a day and reckless of all the future. We would add to the fuel of the hot-house, that the fungus growth may be more luxuriant and the fruitful ashes more abundant.

Do you wonder, then, that good men, fond of republican principles and institutions, forget even the value of legislative bodies; that they are willing to welcome personal power without legislative restraint? Do you wonder that the almost universal feeling of all who have anything to lose, and also have nothing to do with the games by which nations are fleeced for the benefit of unscrupulous intriguers through the forms of law, is one of anxiety, so long as these dangerous bodies continue their sessions, and of almost infinite relief when they disperse to their homes; and that they consider nothing bad in legislation which it is not feared that they may do, and nothing good that is any longer expected of them?

After this, what good can be attained by further debate here on this question? Has not Congress long since voted on the act to redeem this debt in coin? Did it not, when creating the debt, create a sinking fund, by the act of February 25, 1862, with a pledge to apply 1 per cent. to the payment of our entire debt? Are we not already recreant, and convicted of recreancy?

But, sir, for one I shall not be recreant to convictions often expressed here in speeches and reports through many years. I make again a protest against this fresh forerunner of further panic. As sure as the night follows the day, if these inflating bills pass, so sure will the disaster of last September be renewed. Meanwhile the abnormal exhilaration, revived by our action, leaps into the boisterous and crazy chambers of speculation, and buoyantly the balloon fluctuates and floats in the thin and unsubstantial air.

MESSAGES AND PLATFORMS.

Already, in speaking upon this question on the 7th of June, 1870, and on certain bills offered by me and sent to the committee of which I was then a member, I have quoted the message of the democratic predecessor of Governor Dix in favor of accomplishing an early return to the use of gold; and Governor Dix is himself true to his democratic education in his late message; for in no public utterance has such sound dialectics been taught. In vain are all utterances of platform and message. This House refused even to consider a resolution copied by me from General Grant's message on the 20th of December, 1870, for the earliest practical resumption.* He warned you then that no substitute could be devised for a medium of fixed and unvarying standard.

WILL THERE BE A VETO?

When the other day I incidentally interrupted my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] to remind him that his jubilee over the President's Message was without emphasis here, he more than intimated that it was because I had offered it, or rather had dressed it up. So then, if a member opposed to the dominant party happens to assert, along with the Executive, that two and two make four, all the wiseacres of that party insist that they make five! No; the truth is that had such a resolution come from any one, even from an angel, there is so much of the "foolishness of this world" here, that it would have been voted down with insane clamor. But since the gentleman espouses the President so heartily, and says that he will vote hereafter for no one who is for inflation, what will he do when General Grant signs the bill? Are his party cords strong enough to hold him? For myself I promise here that I will certainly oppose the Administration if it does not use the veto! Will the gentleman do the same? Or must he obey the master-will at the White House, and like a courtier,

> As their patron hints the cold or heat,
> Shake in dog days, in December sweat!

Gentlemen think this Congress will be popular for voting inflation! Let the Executive test it by a veto! Your President, with all his recommendations for specie resumption, is not now so popular in California, New York, Ohio, Iowa, Wisconsin, New Hampshire, and elsewhere as he was. "When mankind," said Cicero in his second philippic against Antony, "cannot endure Cæsar, will they endure thee?" We will see upon which side time will work, and who for, on this vexed question!

If Connecticut—all for resumption, of both parties—could not take the republican Congress, will they take this Congress on inflation?

I am aware that the vote on inflation has little party significance, either in Senate or House; but who is not sensible of the fact that the democratic people and platforms, especially the last democratic platform at Utica, on this topic contained no uncertain sound? My friend [Mr. HAWLEY] commended the Connecticut democratic platform. Let him read that of New York*; it demanded specie payments; repudiated repudiation; it denounced all schemes of speculation and taxation either by an increased irredeemable paper credit, or by bounties and monopolies in the shape of tariffs. It rested on the tried and historic principles of the democratic party.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Did not the gentleman say that he was outside of the democratic party?

Mr. COX. No, sir. I said that on this question I held my party relations in this House very loosely; but at the same time I remarked that I stood with the great body of the democratic party outside of this House in demanding specie payment, in demanding that there shall be no repudiation—repudiating it; asking for the restoration of the better money days of the democratic party, which are contemporaneous with the origin of the Government; which belong to all time; which are measured by the right line of truth. Am I outside of the democratic party of Connecticut? No. Am I outside of the democratic party of New York? No. Am I outside of the democracy,

*You may tinker and tinker; you may expand or contract; you may crawl or jump; you may worry and work, but all your labor is in vain if you do not pursue the resolution which I had the honor to offer to an indifferent House on the 20th of December last. It is as follows:

"Resolved, That among the evils growing out of the late civil war is that of an irredeemable paper currency; that it is one of the highest duties of the Government to secure to the citizens a medium of exchange of fixed and unvarying value; and that this implies a return to a specie basis, and no substitute for it can be devised; that it should be commenced now and reached at the earliest practicable moment."

I do not consider this resolution as peculiarly emphatic because it is copied from General Grant's annual message. You have disregarded about all that he recommended, including this; but this is a solution, because it represents the solid sense of the nation, which Congress and the President, in their schemes and jobs, seem latterly to ignore.

The other side of this House owe it to the nation to resume specie payments You promised, and you broke faith. You passed a law against expansion and for a contraction of $4,000,000 per month. You began well; Mr. McCulloch recommended and you approved. Yet you had not the courage to carry out your law. You quailed before the elections. Ah! you repealed the law.—S. S. Cox's speech, June 7, 1870.

*We demand specie payments; for, in the language of the Supreme Court before its bench was packed to reverse a righteous decision, an act making promises to pay paper dollars a legal tender in payment of debts previously contracted is prohibited by the Constitution, and the coinage power conferred upon Congress is an explicit denial of the power to curse the people with a currency inconvertible with coin.

We demand that the fiscal policy of paper inflation, protective tariffs, and Government subsidies shall be abandoned to the half-civilized nations and ages of which it is a relic, because it plunders the farmers of the United States both in the incomes and outgoes; it hamstrings our manifold industries; it converts our foreign commerce into an unsafe speculation, and our domestic trade into a game of chance; it breeds extravagance in our homes and dishonesty in public and private trusts; it fosters corrupt combinations of sectional interests, and is the prime cause of the late financial disasters in which fortunes have been wrecked, credit destroyed, labor deprived of employment and its savings of security.

In the midst of these wide-spread calamities and this general distress, we scout the President's pill for panics—more inflation, more subsidies, more ballooning—and we point the country to their true remedy and cure in the tried and historic principles of the old democracy, applicable throughout our national, State, and municipal life, which limit and localize most jealously the powers intrusted to public servants; which enforce honesty and frugality in public and private affairs; which prescribe equal taxation for all, and a currency as good as gold; and we hold out to the farmers of the United States the right hand of hearty fellowship in their just resistance to the exactions of monopolists, and their just demands for these great reforms. (New York State platform, 1873.)

as it declared itself in our last national convention? No. Where am I? In the very bosom of the democratic party, outside of this House, perhaps, and I am happy in that relation.

But, sir, I would not be kind to my friend [Mr. HAWLEY] if I pronounced the word "Connecticut" too emphatically. There was an election there yesterday. I would be as a zephyr to the fallen flower. Since the new rule as to "laughter" and what not, I do not desire to punctuate my speech with such parentheses. It is a part of magnanimity not to be ungentle on so just a gentleman as my admirable friend from Connecticut. Suppose the State has gone six thousand democratic plurality, (as a telegraph from Governor Ingersoll informs me,) may not the veto restore this? Who knows?

Mr. Speaker, the democratic organization of New York City, within a few days, representing the laboring men and merchants, the dominant element of the city, have reaffirmed, with philosophic calmness and earnest sense, these sound economies. Therefore, loose as are my party ties in this House, my affection for the principles maintained by the democracy—since the remark made by the gentleman, [Mr. HAWLEY]—leads me to refer, with some degree of pride, to my record on this subject.

PERSONAL.

My personal relations to the question began with my education in the hard money—"pot-metal"—days, when democratic prejudice ran high in Ohio against schemes of paper money. It is not my fault if the West or the democracy have changed since then. Believing that the Constitution was the same instrument in war and in peace, and having sworn to support it while a member here during the war, and feeling the sanctity of its provisions, I did not vote to sanction what it did not. Therefore I voted against the legal-tender bill. For stronger reasons, and recognizing the meaning of the cases in 12 Wallace, to which I referred in proposing my thesis here last month, and which has been so plentifully quoted since, I find no warrant in any decision, under war powers or otherwise, for this new issue, or for any issue.

On this question I know that I am in accord with the traditional ethics of the founders of the Government, and of the democratic character, as well as with the legal decisions, early and late, even to the last decision of the packed court which declared these issues not money, only promises to pay money.

My course here has been consistent. Shortly after taking my seat here as a member from New York, on the 16th of December, 1869, (Globe, volume 75, page 190,) an Ohio member made a speech favoring the repudiation of our bonded debt. Opposing that, I said:

> Our legal-tenders are to-day in a state of repudiation. I denounce this and all forms of repudiation. Gentlemen on the other side have not the courage and the skill to propose and carry a plan to redeem that part of the public debt.

In that debate I think the leader of the House, and the reporter of the four hundred million bill passed by us, [Mr. DAWES,] thought I was in a "mood for telling the truth."

I am sure the mood continued when I was called on to investigate the Black-Friday affair. The result of that investigation was fruitless in everything but one. It showed the danger we were in by our system. In closing the report I said:

> One of the minority, Mr. COX, desires to add for himself, in conclusion, that this investigation has no utility, unless it informs the public mind of the absolute necessity, even through temporary distress, and as the only prevention against the recurrence of such disastrous panics, and, further, as the only permanent relief for trade and commerce and business of all kinds, that we should return to gold and silver coin. If this is not taught by this investigation, then it has no lesson. The speculation, debauchery, profligacy, and extravagance incident to such a situation will go on, until it culminates in bankruptcy and poverty.

It is, perhaps, too late to discuss the proposition that legal-tenders in time of war may be justified by necessity. In giving the vote I gave, and which time has justified, I believed that the Constitution gave no power to Congress to emit bills of credit or make anything not coin a tender. There had been no inadvertence when the fathers left out of the organic law such grant of power. They knew what they were doing. Their experience as to paper was peculiar. Nor did I believe in war powers, or the exercise of Federal power, because not prohibited. Nor do I believe in it now. In the absence of all precedent for such issues, except those of the civil war, and for which I am not responsible, I would be perjured if I followed the speech of the fiend, who > —— with necessity,

> The tyrant's plea, excused his devilish deeds.

Most especially so now, in time of peace, when no necessity exists, I cannot give a vote to add to the illegal issues already out. Nor has the Supreme Court, by their 12 Wallace cases, said or implied that an issue of tenders at this time is within the sphere of Congress. To-day, as in 1862, the same attempt, without the same pretext, is made to "torture" the Constitution. Sometimes such tortuous proceeding, like the crooked river Styx, leads through a political cemetery to a clime warmer than tropical. Uzzah put forth his hand to the ark of the Lord, and took hold of it, and the anger of the Lord was kindled, and he smote him. Let us heed the lesson. Pardon me if in the relict radiance of the past I find a better light to guide my footsteps than that which glares from below.

NEW YORK SENTIMENT.

In speaking of this light, I do not refer to the Will-o'-the-wisp which pursues my colleague [Mr. MELLISH] who spoke some days ago in derogation of the sentiment of the city of New York at the Cooper Institute meeting. Yet what did that meeting do or say not in the general interest? They thought a plethora of paper not redeemed in coin was dangerous. It would lead to speculation and disaster. It would lead to fresh clamor for new issues. They held that such issues were lies; that a promise was not money; that such issues would derange values and deter from legitimate business. They held especially that it would be injurious to the agricultural and laboring classes, as it would enhance the price of the commodities they need and buy, without compensating benefits. They disliked any free-banking system not founded in safeguards and on coin.

In these phrases my colleague wiped out of the universe, by his shorthand method, the luminous financiers of New York.

> I read in utter amazement the speeches delivered at the Cooper Institute, New York, at the meeting on the 24th instant; and witnessing so much folly, ignorance, and fatuity there, I said to myself, Where, then, shall we look for wisdom? But on scanning the list of speakers put forward it was evident that the affair was engineered mainly by free-traders, who we all know are working with might and main to promote British doctrines and British interests on this continent; they constitute, indeed, a class of men who, consciously or unconsciously, are the enemies of the country, in that they are the enemies of the American policy advocated by Clay, Webster, Greeley, Carey, Webb, and a long line of earnest patriots.

The amazement of this gentleman is doubtless reciprocated. The British free-traders—enemies of their country, fools, and ignoramuses—doubtless said, if they observed this gem of polite learning, "Where, indeed, shall we look for wisdom!" except we look up to this seraph, whose wings flap so awfully over our chaotic world of finance, distilling celestial fiscal fragrance. Where else shall we look for wisdom, except to one so adept in figures as my colleague? Why he comes here through a neat device of partisan arithmetic. He has its addition and division without its silences. In view of the fact that he received 7,841 votes in a district where there were 12,925 democratic votes given for two democrats, on an unfortunate division not possible again, my colleague ought not to be overbold in challenging or deriding the fiscal ignorance of unspeculative and republican metropolitans. It may provoke inquiry, if not a smile, to the Bryants, Stewarts, Lows, Coopers, Taylors, Hunts, Astors, Belmonts, Cowdins, and others, mostly republican merchants of the metropolis, when they ask after my colleague's right, politically or otherwise, to call them to account. These British fools and tools, as he would call them, were not my supporters. I was elected by no aid of theirs, although, if they believe in the right of each individual to employ his labor innocently to his best advantage, (which is free trade,) I should have been happy in their support; but I was elected by the workingmen, in whose interest my humble labors are directed here. However, as an observer, and faithful to the city, I am happy to know that without dissent the immense circle of varied and substantial interests of New York are representative of something in legislation, and especially on this topic, not yet apparent in our action here.

It may be, however, that in talking to the jury after the verdict I am one of their fatuous class. Yet I presume to discuss the following propositions:

1. That the law stands three hundred and fifty-six millions, and that the Secretary has knowingly violated it.
2. That Congress has not the constitutional power to authorize the issue of a dollar, even if it were wise to do so, and that if it had the power and it were wise, it should not be done in a manner that excuses the Secretary for an assumption of power.
3. That in no event would it be wise.

THE LAW ONLY FOR THREE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-SIX MILLIONS.

First. There can be no doubt that the law stands to-day for an issue of only $356,000,000. Congress, by the act of February, 1866, authorized the Secretary to retire and cancel, at a certain rate, legal-tenders from the surplus funds of the Department. This was discontinued by the act of February, 1868, after the forty-four million reserve had been canceled. It was so reported by the Secretary. No person in or out of Congress ever before October, 1872, made a claim to the contrary.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to ask the gentleman why he calls these notes a "reserve" if they can never be called into action.

Mr. COX. I call them a "reserve" because that is the general technical terminology of the subject. "Reserve!" There is no such word as that in any of the laws. These notes were never known as a "reserve" except when they were wanted to be reissued in October, 1872, just before the election. Then they were called a reserve. Our present Secretary of the Treasury says that their reissue was in accordance with the interpretation of the law from the beginning. That is not the fact. Years had passed without any such interpretation. If gentlemen will examine the matter they will find that at that time no defense of that action of the Secretary of the Treasury was made in this House.

Mr. DAWES. While I agree entirely with the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] in the legal construction he states in regard to this $44,000,000, I know he does not want to do an injustice to anybody. The gentleman says, as I understand him, that until the action of Mr. BOUTWELL, as Secretary of the Treasury, there was never any attempt by the Treasury Department to exercise this authority over that $44,000,000. Now, if the gentleman will go into the Treasury Department with me, I can show him by the book that these notes were brought back into the Treasury and reissued under Mr. McCulloch, over and over again.

The unfortunate construction of the law was by Mr. McCulloch. Instead of following that branch of the law which required him to refund, and thereby cancel them, he kept them in the Treasury, and from time to time reissued the indentical notes. The books of the Treasury Department show it. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, he was wrong in the law. Mr. McCulloch was wrong, Mr. BOUTWELL was wrong, Mr. Secretary Richardson was wrong; but that they were honest I have no doubt.

The gentleman from New York could not get the House up to the point of declaring it was unlawful to issue them. In spite of the Committee on Ways and Means, in spite of the Senate, notwithstanding the report of the majority of their Committee on Finance, the Senate refused to indorse that report, and the Attorney-General of the United States gave his official opinion to the contrary; and therefore my friend from New York does him injustice when he says he is not entitled to be considered honest in his administration. That he was mistaken, I am just as clearly of the opinion as the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will confess, after Mr. BOUTWELL had acknowledged his wrong and after the matter had been thoroughly examined, the present Secretary reissued this reserve. It made no excuse for him because it was done by his predecessor. As to the motive I will not undertake to impute wrong; I will give facts known to all merchants and others, as given to me.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman misunderstands me. I say he is wrong; but the law officers of the Government, the judges of the Supreme Court, and others say he is right. A majority of both branches agreed with him and disagreed with the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. I know it is the general impression of some of the best merchants in the city I in part represent, that when this panic broke out there were various little games of fluctuation. But, Mr. Speaker, I will give the facts as to that, as given to me. But first let me say this: There is not an act on the books that has the word "reserve" in it, as applied to a sum of $44,000,000. Congress never had before created or permitted a reserve that it did not at the same time stipulate a specific purpose for which the reserve was to be held. There is no precedent even to base such an idea upon. There is nothing to base it on except incapacity or something worse.

DEFIANCE OF THE LAW.

The Secretary has knowingly assumed a power by the issue of legal-tenders which, instead of being pardoned, should rather be punished. In the case of the present Secretary it amounts to a bold defiance of law and of Congress. Had he not the report of the Senate Finance Committee last year? Did they not examine into the legality of the issue made in October, 1872? Did not that committee hear Mr. Secretary BOUTWELL, in his own defense? And although it excused him on the ground of honesty of purpose, it declared that the issue was without warrant of law; and in effect, that no further legislation could make the law plainer. How, then, can his successor be excused on the ground of honesty of purpose?

The present Secretary of the Treasury, in his last report, says:

> On February 4, 1868, Congress passed an act suspending the further reduction of the currency when the amount outstanding was $356,000,000, and that sum is now the minimum limit of issue. But the law authorizing the issue of the maximum of $400,000,000 has never been repealed, and has uniformly been held by the Treasury Department and the law officers thereof to be in full force.

Did he not know that Congress was aware that the law had not been repealed? Perhaps he will advise us whether the laws authorizing the issue of the seven-thirty Treasury notes, the compound-interest notes, the 6 per cent. notes, the 4 per cent. notes, and a variety of other issues, which were authorized to meet a great trial, were also repealed. Wherein do they differ from the act of 1866, directing the Secretary to retire and cancel certain legal-tenders at a certain rate?

The act suspending the further "retiring and canceling" of legal-tenders became a law in February, 1868. The first annual report thereafter was in December, 1868. Secretary McCulloch, in his report of December 1, is silent upon the subject except in expressing regret that the authority to continue to contract had been withdrawn, and that the act of Congress in this feature was unwise.

Whatever was thought by others, however, there was one officer who expressed himself clearly. It was the Comptroller of the Currency. In his report, contemporaneously, he says:

> If the Treasury of the United States could hold in reserve a certain amount of legal-tender notes in excess of the amount of money in regular circulation, to be advanced to banking institutions at a specified rate of interest upon the deposit of United States bonds as collateral security, a source of relief would be established which would effectually prevent, &c. * * * In time of severe pressure the Bank of England has been authorized by the chancellor of the exchequer to issue its notes in excess of the limitations prescribed in its charter. This was done in violation or without authority of law, upon the pledge by the government of an act of indemnity. In our Government no power to make such pledges exists, and therefore any extraordinary provision of the character suggested must be authorized by law.

Between the times the two laws were passed, 1866 and 1868, no one authoritatively hinted at the possibility of a "reserve." In December, 1869, Mr. BOUTWELL did not. He urged upon Congress, as a step toward specie payments, the restoration of the law of 1866, or rather for the authority to retire and cancel a sum of legal-tenders not exceeding $2,000,000 per month. Surely he did not expect to reach resumption by contracting only for a reissue.

Where, then, is the evidence that the Department held that "reserve" and "cancellation" were convertible terms? O, yes; in October, 1872, just before the elections, the power to issue and retire was assumed. It was an enormous stretch of power, compromising every value in the United States. Then we begin to learn that the four hundred million law is in full force. Six years after the retiring and canceling law was enacted we have this monstrous assumption! This "uniformity" of interpretation seems to peep out first in the Secretary's report of 1872.

No one can doubt that the issue of some $10,000,000 was the cause of the panic of 1873. It begot reckless gambling; and gambling begot disaster, not merely upon the gamesters, but upon the innocent and solid merchant, farmer, and workingman.

In the report of December, 1871, Secretary BOUTWELL is silent upon the subject; but Mr. Comptroller Hulburd, in his report to the Secretary, comes to the front, and in writing upon the subject of specie payments says:

> So prevalent was this view of the case at one time that in 1866 Congress, in obedience to what was regarded as a sound and correct principle of political economy, provided by law for a gradual withdrawal and "cancellation" of United States notes, &c. * * * To the people this stringency seemed to be produced by the contraction, though it is now evident that other causes conspired to aid and produce the result. * * * This opinion had all the force of conviction in the public mind, and found its appropriate expression in an act of Congress which became law in February, 1868, prohibiting any further reduction of the currency; and so the matter now stands.

Further on, in the same paper, he urges the policy of the "repeal" of the act of 1868—the act suspending the further retiring and canceling of United States notes.

It is established, therefore, by the acts of the fiscal officers and the provisions of law that the Secretary has knowingly assumed unlawful powers. It would be only an extenuation to show that there was an apparent necessity for the act, that it was done honestly, and not from incapacity or dishonesty. But is there such extenuation?

INCAPACITY—OR DISHONESTY?

On the 18th of September, 1873, the Treasury held over $15,000,000 in currency balances. This was not reserve. The panic, which was then commencing, culminated on the 20th. Now it was clear to every man of ordinary judgment that what had occurred in Wall street would sweep the whole country, and so reduce the receipts of the Government as to render certain that the Secretary of the Treasury would requre all his balances to meet his ordinary expenses, even if there had been an attempt to stop all unnecessary works. This was not done, but should have been done. Notwithstanding, however, this certainty, and after the panic in Wall street had spent itself, the Secretary deliberately violates the law of March 18, 1869, by the purchase of $13,000,000 of bonds, until the balance was reduced to about three millions. All the money thus paid out went to New York, and it has not to this day been of any service to the legitimate business of the country. The consequences of this were soon discovered to be an empty cash-box, a result probably foreseen by every one but our astute Secretary. Then comes the "reserve." No man in the country would ever become a bankrupt if he had the right or power to pay his debts by the issue of "due-bills," yet this is what the "Department" considers the highest pinnacle of financial wisdom! There are no calculations tending to keep expenses down to receipts, or reserving from receipts to meet a certain want in the near future.

LITTLE GAMES UPON THE STREET.

Has the "reserve" been issued with a single eye to the requirements of the Departments, or has speculation had her finger in the manipulation of the daily changes in outstanding legal-tenders?

It is well known that the Department has not had a settled policy in transferring from the "reserve" to the balance either a large sum at once, and then another when that was gone, or that it has drawn from time to time as the necessary payments for the day exceeded the receipts. Its policy, on the contrary, has been a fluctuating issue, up and down, put out one day and taken partly back the next. One example will answer as illustrative: During the whole of December the Treasury balances were less than $2,000,000, and on the 30th of December were down to only $429,000, and outstanding legal-tenders were $376,244,000.

	January 8.	January 9.	January 10.
Currency balances	$2, 821, 000	$4, 250, 000	$4, 500, 000
Legal-tenders	379, 681, 000	381, 231, 000	381, 891, 000
Revenue receipts	226, 000	535, 000	239, 087

Thus after having run the Department with a balance ranging from half a million to two millions, it suddenly became necessary on the 9th of January to increase the balance to $4,250,000 by a transfer of legal-tenders of $2,500,000; and again on the 10th still further enlarge the balance by another transfer of $660,000.

These daily changes are reported in Wall street generally about two o'clock p. m. On the 9th and 10th of January the reports of increased outstanding legal-tenders were there by half-past one o'clock. Why were these large amounts of legal-tenders withdrawn from the reserve only to enlarge the balance? Will the following help to explain it? and if so, when gentlemen say that the Secretary acted from honest motives and ought not to be impeached, I am tempted to ask, What, then, is the power behind the throne?

On the 8th of January, the market at the New York Stock Exchange had been heavy and declining, and closed at the lowest point of the day with a downward tendency. Now mark the prices of a few of the leading stocks:

Stocks.	January 8.	January 9.	January 9.	January 9.
	Closed.	Opened.	2 p. m.	Closed.
New York Central and Hudson	100¼	100½	101	101
Lake Shore	81½	82	82⅜	82⅝
Chicago and Northwestern	60½	61¼	62	61⅝
Saint Paul	47⅞	47⅞	48¾	49⅛
Western Union Telegraph	76¼	76¾	78	79
Ohio and Mississippi	33	33⅜	34⅛	34⅝

Who in New York knew what was going to happen before the day was over? Who knew it so well, that they were willing to give orders to pay from ¼ to ½ per cent. higher at the opening on the 9th than the same were offered at at the close of the 8th instant.

This may be chance; but there are several instances of like nature during the periods this $27,000,000 has been dropping out of the "reserve." At any rate, Mr. Speaker, one jealous of the exercise of such enormous powers has a right to be fiercely critical when anything even seems suspicious.

The offense should not have been condoned until this matter was satisfactorily explained. It should not have been condoned, as it was by our votes last Monday week, for the gross incapacity displayed in the management of the funds of the Department, even if there had been no evil intent.

Nay, further; there is no power to condone. It cannot be condoned, for even Congress has not the power to issue notes as legal-tenders. Under no circumstances should a precedent be established of permitting the executive officer to transgress the law. For one, I desire that my vote on the proposition of Mr. E. H. ROBERTS for the $382,000,000 shall not be so considered. That was a customary vote for the lesser of two inevitable curses.

CONGRESS NO POWER TO ISSUE.

Second. Congress has not the power to pass the bill we sent to the Senate legalizing the reserve issue, and making the legal-tenders four hundred millions, if it were wise or expedient.

Do you want ancient or recent authority for this statement? Read the debates on the legal-tender bill which Mr. Spaulding, of Buffalo, has collected. The contemporary interpretation of this law is uniform that it was a forced loan. On December 9, 1868, Mr. Spaulding wrote Mr. McCulloch that it was introduced as a war measure—a measure of temporary relief. As a peace measure he held it to be unconstitutional. I append an extract from his letter as a note.*

CONTEMPORARY EXPOSITION.

Those who supported the project did it with an acknowledgment that the measure was extraconstitutional, and could only be supported on the plea of an overpowering necessity.

Need I refer to the speeches of CONKLING, Lovejoy, Pendleton, and others in the House at the time the act of 1862 was passed? Need I go to the Senate debates of February, 1862? Need I go further back than Mr. Lincoln's administration and to the legal-tender act of February 25, 1862? Mr. Chase, who was Secretary of the Treasury, had despaired of being able to raise any more money by loans to carry on the war, then in progress for nearly a year, and he suggested to Congress the issue of United States notes, the same to be made legal-tenders for all public and private debts, and that he firmly believed that without this legal-tender clause there was no hope of saving the Union. He therefore urged the measure upon Congress. Before its passage the constitutional questions involved were fully discussed, but even some of the warmest friends of the Administration could not be induced to vote for it.

*In the imminent peril in which we were then placed by a gigantic rebellion, Congress decided that the legal-tender act was a measure necessary and proper to carry into effect those powers expressly granted in the Constitution to maintain the Army and support the Navy. Secretary Chase relied at this time mainly upon the passage of the national-currency act to furnish the means; but it appeared to me that it would be wholly inadequate, and besides it could not be made available quick enough. I therefore introduced the legal-tender bill early in January, 1862, immediately after the suspension of specie payments. In this great crisis I advocated the bill as a war measure—a measure of temporary relief to the Treasury; and, on the ground that it was an imperative necessity to preserve the life of the nation, I conceded that it was a forced loan, and could only be justified on grounds of necessity.

As a war measure, passed during the war, continuing during the war, and as long as the exigency lasted, I believe it was necessary and proper to successfully carry on the war, and was therefore constitutional. I am equally clear that as a peace measure it is unconstitutional. No one would now think of passing a legal-tender act making the promises of the Government (a mere form of credit) a legal tender in payment of "all debts, public and private." Such a law, passed while the Government is on a peace footing, could not be sustained for one moment. I think now that it is unfortunate that we did not have incorporated into the original legal-tender act, at the time of its passage, a provision that the legal-tender clause should cease to be operative in one year after the close of the war. In that case all parties would have shaped their business accordingly, and the law would have served its purpose as a war measure, and would not have been continued (as I think unnecessarily) so long after the close of the war.—E. G. Spaulding, December 8, 1868.

Mr. SHERMAN said, "I agree that this measure can only be justified on the ground of necessity. Is there such a necessity?" and so on. Those who supported the measure at all did so, as stated by Mr. Fessenden, on the ground of "absolute, overwhelming necessity."

Mr. Collamer could not bring himself to vote for any measure which was unconstitutional—admitted to be so by its friends—on any plea of necessity.

Mr. Cowan was surprised that such a question would even enter the American Senate. "Surely if anything in the world is settled—settled by the fathers, by contemporary history, painful experience, and the total absence of all precedents for the exercise of these powers—it is that they were never delegated, nor intended to be delegated." "I have never," he said, "until now heard it doubted. If this is not settled, then nothing is settled, and we are all at sea."

On the motion to strike out the legal-tender clause, under this immense pressure of "absolute, overwhelming necessity," it was saved only by a vote of 22 to 17. On its final passage the vote was 30 to 7, Mr. Collamer's and Mr. Cowan's making two of the seven votes.

What said Secretary Fessenden in December, 1865?

The right of Congress to borrow money and to issue obligations for loans in such form as may be convenient is unquestionable; but the authority to issue obligations for a circulating medium as money, and to make these obligations a legal tender, can only be found in the unwritten law, which sanctions whatever the representatives of the people, whose duty it is to maintain the Government against its enemies, may consider, in a great emergency, necessary to be done.

The present legal-tender acts were all of them war measures only. These were the opinions of the men who legislated with the enemy's guns almost threatening the very Halls in which they were. Their unwillingness to take the step is painfully evident; as plainly evident as the judgment of the tribunals of justice which have been passed on these acts.

What new light has since been cast upon the constitutional power of Congress? The learned chairman of the Committee on Banking should either be able to inform us or stand convicted of offering to us the poisoned cup of perjury.

The greatest constitutional statesman this country ever produced used language in the Senate that should never be forgotten. I refer to Daniel Webster, who on December 21, 1836, in the Senate of the United States, said:

Most unquestionably there is no legal tender in this country, under the authority of this Government, or any other, but gold and silver, either the coinage of our own mints or foreign coins, at rates regulated by Congress. This is a constitutional principle, perfectly plain, and of the highest importance. The States are expressly prohibited from making anything but gold and silver a legal tender in the payment of debts, and although no such express prohibition is applied to Congress, yet as Congress has no power granted to it in this respect but to coin money and to regulate the value of foreign coins, it clearly has no power to substitute paper or anything else for coin as a tender in payment of debts and in discharge of contracts. Congress has exercised this power fully in both its branches. It has coined money, and still coins it; it has regulated the value of foreign coins, and still regulates their value. The legal tender therefore, the constitutional standard of value, is established and cannot be overthrown. To overthrow it would shake the whole system.

SUPREME COURT DECISIONS.

With this opinion the latest decision of the Supreme Court is not antagonistic. That decision only confirms the extraconstitutional powers of Congress in seasons of great emergency. Thus said Justice Strong, who delivered the opinion of the majority of the court, (Knox vs. Lee, 12 Wallace, 457:)

It is not to be denied that acts may be adapted to the exercise of lawful power and appropriate to it in seasons of emergency, which would be inappropriate to it at other times.

What is meant by "other times," if not the present? Is there any war? Is there compulsion? Is retrenchment or profligacy the emergency? If there is an "unwritten law of necessity," certainly there are no surroundings now for its execution!

I have not referred to the first decision as to legal tender, (8 Wallace, 603, Hepburn vs. Griswold.) The court held in that case that the legal-tender act was unconstitutional so far as it made greenbacks legal tender in payment of debts contracted before the date of the law. Three dissenting judges made the act a war measure. But why should I refer to the first or last decision further? It is enough to say, while it is not the general judgment of the bench or bar that the first decision should have been overruled; while we may be permitted, for certain reasons, to spurn the last decision, yet in the present emergency I may quote Justice Bradley, who expresses the views of the majority when he says:

It follows as another corollary from the views which I have expressed that the power to make Treasury notes a legal tender, while a mere incidental one to that of issuing the notes themselves and to one of the forms of borrowing money, is nevertheless a power not to be resorted to except upon extraordinary and pressing occasions, such as war or other public exigencies of great gravity and importance.

Suppose, then, you reissue these "reserves," new notes as they are, and the question of their constitutionality again arises, what may not the court decide?

The outstanding legal-tenders at the time of this decision were only three hundred and fifty-six millions. This was the sum total known to the law. Now, if Congress has the power to issue forty-four millions which had once been paid and canceled by authority of Congress, why does it not have the same power to issue the whole four hundred millions after it shall once have been paid off and passed out of existence? Why? Simply because it did issue four hundred millions in a time of overwhelming necessity. This is the ridiculous legal logic of inflation!

Suppose, therefore, that this bill should become a law, will it not meet with an adverse decision at the hands of the court? Will not that add to the confusion worse confounded—fresh chaos, litigation, and trouble?

IS IT WISE TO ISSUE MORE LEGAL-TENDERS?

Third. If Congress had the power—and it is wise to condone an illegal act of the Secretary—would it not still be adverse to the best interest of the country to add to the present volume of legal-tenders?

GOLD AND ITS INTRINSIC VALUE.

In discussing this question it is necessary to understand why gold and silver have been such factors in the business of our star. Some have said that gold and silver had only an extrinsic value, and that intrinsically its value was less than iron per pound. This is attributed to a factitious value early given through religious worship of the sun and moon—gold and silver! But I can call upon the members from the mining States for a better solution. Never a dollar of gold or silver came from the earth, went through the stamp-mill, and through the quicksilver and furnace, but cost more than dollar for dollar! Do you wonder that it is a medium? All disputation would cease if men would only remember that a dollar is not an abstraction; but that it is 412.5 grains of silver, or 25.8 of gold. A piece of printed paper not convertible with gold, if it were plastered with all the imagery of the ages and the superscriptions from Cæsar down to Grant, would only be a dishonored promise to pay.

Moreover, preciousness, cohesiveness, and divisibility belong to gold as to no other element. Separate color from the prism, or extension from matter; but you cannot separate the utilities which belong to gold as a medium for men. God has hardened it in millions of years, in which the mountains come and go like the rainbow. It is as true as its burnished source, the sun. Its silent power, like that of the dial, measures our height of prosperity or our depth of adversity.

MONEY OR CURRENCY?

Again, it is necessary to draw a line between money and currency. While money may be currency, it does not follow that currency is money. Money is only that which is a legal tender in payment of debts; it is the unit in which other currencies—be they bank-notes or bank-checks—are redeemable or payable.

In this country, by statute, the only legal-tenders are certain United States notes, while national-bank notes are simply the representatives of money because they are redeemable in legal-tenders. Take away the redeemable feature from them and they might be secured by deposits of double the amount in United States bonds; they would immediately be at a discount, and soon draw out of circulation.

In this discussion we are only treating of money. Currency and its elasticity might safely be left to commerce. Government does its whole duty when it provides for a proper security for the certain payment of the circulation of the banks.

EFFECT ON CAPITAL AND LABOR.

An irredeemable paper money is an unequal tax upon the working classes. To the capitalist who pays his taxes from his surplus income the burden is light compared to that of the man who pays it off his dinner-table. It is not an exaggerated estimate to say that the tax paid in this manner by the classes who live on their daily earnings, simply by the average enhanced price of their living, caused by an irredeemable paper money, is yearly greater than the interest on the public debt. Webster once said:

> Of all contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind, none has been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper money. Ordinary tyranny, oppression, excessive taxation, these bear lightly on the happiness of the masses of the community, compared with a fraudulent currency and the robberies committed by depreciated paper. Our own history has recorded for our instruction enough, and more than enough, of the demoralizing tendency, the injustice, and the intolerable oppression, on the virtuous and well-disposed, of a degraded paper currency authorized or in any way countenanced by Government.

Have we not proved the truth of Mr. Webster's words? Have we not in the past ten years seen built up fortunes whose colossal proportions threaten to swallow up all the branches of industry, while at the same time the poor have grown poorer and the middle class growing daily less in numbers and influence?

Capital refuses to engage in legitimate enterprises under an irredeemable paper money, because so long as that is the money of the country it is at the mercy of an ever-changing policy and of a Protean Congress. You may issue a thousand millions of legal-tenders; it must at last, if not at first, fall into the hands of capitalists. Those who have something to part with for it will either directly engage in speculations themselves, or will keep their capital well in hand by loaning it on call for speculative purposes. Our history proves this. The very issue under examination proves it; it has been paid out all over country, but where is the largest portion of it to-day? In the speculation markets of the country, and that portion which is not there already will be as soon as it can make the circuit and get there. Is not money now abundant in the moneyed centers?

Gentlemen say that the mills all over the country are at work again; and they point to that fact as an argument for the good this issue has done. Do they imagine that the mills would never have started again except for the printing-press of the Treasury Department? How long were the mills suspended in the crisis of 1857? We have had panics and crises before, and the country has always recovered before, and will now, at least for a time, although we probably are still to suffer. But, sir, the issue of more legal-tenders will not hasten the day of total recovery, although in some few instances it may save some individual who happens to be the holder of worthless securities or depreciated property, which depend upon wild speculation for a market price.

EFFECT ON TRADE.

Do the gentlemen who cry so loud for this forty-four millions or more of paper money expect to see it result in times like 1862 to 1865? If so, they must add to it another great war, or they will be disappointed. Those were busy times, when everybody in trade made money, and they only had to buy an article of merchandise one day and see the market price advance the next. But were they caused alone by the issue of legal-tenders? Had the immense orders given by the Government for army supplies nothing to do with it? It was not an issue of four hundred millions which they spent, but that four hundred millions borrowed and reborrowed, until they had spent three thousand millions nearly. Repeat that, and money will be easy and enough to go around with only three hundred and fifty-six millions legal money—and you can buy and sell at a profit to your heart's content. It would be easy now to prove that it was a great error—the issue of notes with the legal attributes of money; that it would have been less expensive to the Government to have borrowed money by sale of bonds even at fifty cents on the dollar; that on an average Government paid more than two prices for everything it purchased, besides the extravagance and waste which would have been saved if money had been obtained at what would have appeared such a high rate; for it has been reckoned that it cost us $1,500,000,000 more to fight down the civil war because of this paper money. And, what is of more consequence, it would have saved the country from a demoralization which has turned and still turns the whole capital of the country into enterprises that are purely speculative. In a word, capital might as well, and with equal benefit to the country, be engaged in a faro-bank as the operations of the stock and gold market.

RICH AND POOR.

Congress, since it took its backward step in February, 1868, has legislated for the benefit of the rich. It has bought bonds not due, which were sold at a large discount in gold, and has taken care to sustain the prices in the markets of the world of these bonds, belonging exclusively to the rich, and held by choice, who were not asking for their money, and were content with the payment of the interest, while it has taken no step to protect that portion of its debt which is the only portion in which the laboring classes are interested. Its greenback unredeemed is nothing less than a forced loan payable on demand. The people were compelled by statute to take it. This has been permitted to drift up and down in its value at the will of speculators. If there is any portion of the debt of the United States more sacred than another, any portion of a debt which should be first paid or appreciated in value, it is that portion which promises to pay on demand, and which does not pay interest. It would be well for gentlemen to understand that the people are beginning to see through the one-sided operations of the Government in the management of its debts. The people understand that a paper dollar which they are compelled to accept in payment of their hard earnings shall be made as good as the rich man's on whose bond you pay 6 per cent. interest.

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR.

Again, it is said that inflation helps the debtor and contraction the creditor. If so, who is benefited? There is (as the money writer in the New York Herald estimates) $1,200,000,000 now due by savings-banks and for wages, &c., to workingmen. This is represented now by a depreciated currency only worth eighty-eight cents on the dollar! In other words, this class is out of pocket over two hundred millions as the result of bad fiscal policies!

BACKWARD OR FORWARD?

Again, let me say that in my opinion the country is better prepared for steps toward specie payments than it has been since 1868. The crisis has come. Trade is slowly recovering, and although it may be healthy, it will be reduced fully one-third, if not one-half, below what it has been in past years. Is not, therefore, the actual need for money for legitimate business purposes largely reduced? At least it is for some time to come. Capital has been sunk, and must be reproduced; it cannot be printed into existence by printing evidences of debt and stamping them legal-tenders. Now is the time to take the first step successfully toward doing our duty; and yet now is the time we are taking the backward step! When will we go forward?

The House may recollect a bill introduced by me to recall and stamp as not legal-tenders the portion of the reserve already out. My colleague [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] thought this to be impracticable. Why? Because there is no record by numbers or otherwise of the issue. The old issue even is not abroad. As it turns out, it was burned, and new issues made. My bill therefore could give, if passed, no practical help toward the great desideratum. Who is to blame for this? Was this done for a purpose and "on purpose?"

This reserve currency has been paid out and is a just debt of the United States, although not a "legal tender." But no action can or will be taken. If it could be found and marked, it should be declared to be illegal. Acknowledge the debt and provide for its funding; and for any further deficiencies in the Treasury which are immediate, and which retrenchment cannot stop, we might in great need provide for by a temporary loan.

The banks are daily pressing their loans upon Wall street, so little are the mercantile interests in want of money, or rather so few are the collaterals to deposit for the same. What good will this new issue do? Will it add one dollar to the collaterals in the pocket-books of the merchants, so that they can obtain any additional bank credit? Will not Wall street and the produce exchange swallow the whole of it up in a ten, twenty, or thirty days' advance of prices?

What the country is demanding through its chambers of commerce and its boards of trade from one end to the other, and what the laboring classes are demanding, as yet in feeble tones, is not quantity but quality, not bulk but kind.

No measure like this, which, as the prophet describes, makes "the ephah small, and the shekel great, and falsifying the balances by deceit," will last. We must build by the plumb-line of right.

TAXES BY TARIFF AND IRREDEEMABLE NOTES.

I had occasion to speak here during the war against the tariff and its connection with an irredeemable paper currency. As the customs are due in gold, Mr. Speaker, you can readily understand why all imported commodities which come in competition with those produced here should be enhanced in price as well by the cost of the gold premium for the duty as for the price paid for the foreign product. The hundreds of millions which since, our bad paper money, have been thus paid by the poor laborer and industrious farmer are simply incalculable. I calculated last fall that, taking the imports for the past four years and the average price of gold, the people had to pay $400,000,000 and more to buy the gold to pay for our imports and the customs dues. They paid so much extra—added to the price of commodities imported—as tribute to administrative stupidity and congressional selfishness. They paid $3.50 per capita, because we did not make our standard that of commerce and the world, the Constitution and the Almighty. Since then a friend, Mr. J. S. Moore, has printed in the Capital some significant figures, abundantly confirming the enormous cost of irredeemable paper to the people since the war. How does he reach it? From 1865 to 1869 the average gold premium was 40 per cent.; the imports were, total, $1,857,524,417; duties, in gold, $690,977,486; freight, paid in gold, $100,000,000; making a grand total of $2,648,501,903, on which the gold premium of 40 per cent. is $1,059,400,076. From 1869 to 1873 the premium on gold has only averaged 15 per cent.; the goods imported, gold duty and gold freight, altogether, were $3,180,931,481; and the premium was $477,139,722. Mechanics! Farmers! Consumers all! Victims each! Have ye no eyes to see the causes of your impoverishment by tariffs and rag money? Is this billion and a half but the idle cloud of statistics, above which your gas-distended falsehood swells and floats? Believe not these trimmers, who tell you that they have the wonderful lamp. Their Aladdin is a liar. There is no magic to make "more money" honestly, except by moil and toil. Why will not Congress respond to just calculations and principles? Cannot we tell corpulence from health; bloat from real flesh? When we plucked the rose of paper money, did not the people feel the thorn? Are they crying to get rid of the infamous tariffs? What is the meaning of the clamor? Let them cry then for coin as the universal standard! Until that is responded to we will have from all quarters the report which Judge Pierrepont makes of his western observations as to the causes of the depression of farm products.* We will have a verification of Mr. Amasa Walker's deductions as to the high prices of all articles the farmers buy and the low prices they receive.

To increase the currency in the face of the great abundance of money and low rates of interest and prices greatly inflated, is to increase the difficulties now resting upon the nation. What the country and people want is cheap productions to enable them to compete successfully in our exchanges with the world. It costs 50 per cent. more to produce wheat, corn, cotton, and tobacco than before the great rebellion. We produce under inflations, dispose of our supplies in the Liverpool market in competition with the cheap countries of the world, and the price obtained regulates the price at home. Thus we buy dear and sell cheap. Increasing the currency thus increases the cost of production without increasing the value in the European markets.

If we had ten times as much real money, gold, in the country, and if it came here legitimately in response to our productions and industries, there would be no redundancy, for we would have earned it. But, sir, $1,000 of money which is not what it professes to be is a redundancy of the kind, and only tolerated because of our poverty.

A NICE PLAN, AND SO ECONOMIC! THREE FOR ONE!

I had the honor the other day to have an amendment read—that every dollar of greenbacks out should count three as legal-tenders. This amendment was offered in the interest of economy, to save the expenses of printing. Some of the rural members with inflation proclivities thought it a foolish amendment; in fact one of them—it would be invidious to name where the majority is of equal intelligence—thought my amendment economically intended but quaintly applied. Perhaps it would be better to argue the economies on an appropriation bill; but in view of the payment of salaries, in the printing and issuing of currency, in view of the trouble Congressmen have in the proper selection and ardent recommendation of girls for the Printing Bureau, in view of the time required for the manufacture of new bills, the dangers from altering and counterfeiting, of overissuing and duplicating, and from the spurious notes issued from the genuine plates, and from the fact that there must be several establishments, which, by doing portions of the work, act as checks on each other, on the Government paper-mill and the Printing Bureau, there is much saving knowledge in my simple suggestion. Do you know the skilled labor required? The specific recommendations for appropriations in the Treasury is half a million; for the bank-note companies more. Certainly no one would object to my proposition on the score of saving money.

Why, then, may not the blessed results of inflation be reached in a less disastrous way by my suggestion? Let me illustrate: If we make our paper currency three times greater in amount than it is at present, would it then be worth one-third less than it is now? In fact, experience shows that it is worse than this. Excessive issues of irredeemable paper, as all history shows, create a depreciation beyond the ratio of its amount. In fact, it soon becomes entirely worthless. Like the circle in the water it enlarges itself, till by spreading it is dispersed into nothing. Need I refer to China, Denmark, Austria—to France, to Law, to the assignats, to the continental, to the confederate currencies! Must I rehearse axioms, or prove them a posteriori? Have not the debates here shown this? If not, let me refer you to Hildreth's volume on "Banks, banking, and paper currencies," 1840. Law's Mississippi scheme had the entire province of Louisiana, to say nothing of the Senegal, India, and China companies, as its basis. Somebody realized richly at first, though the coin left the kingdom; the notes began to go down; edicts were issued in vain; credit was shocked; no safe standard existed; poverty and distress came; rebellion threatened; the notes were stopped by a prohibitory edict; and was France happy? Read the last fiction of Victor Hugo, "Ninety-three," and you will find what the assignats did for her. He copies an English novelist in the fullness of his terrible truths told in fancy, which not only occurred in Law's time, as depicted by Ainsworth, but in all times and lands where irredeemable overissues are made. Go to Saint Domingo to-day, where two hundred dollars does not equal a thousand, and you will have a recent illustration of an inevitable law. As in France in the time of the Mississippi bubble, a lingering decline would have been more fatal, so now and here a prompt resumption would be less fatal to our people. If we must have such disasters, we might as well at once have everybody feel three times better off in pocket by simply stamping on each note, "This is three dollars instead of one." Would not the somber image of Daniel Webster on our ten-dollar greenback smile at such an economic device? And General Jackson, whose image is on our five-dollar notes, that old bank-hater; why, his very hair would rear on end like his bronze horse by Mills!

Let me illustrate further the benefits of this wonderful forced loan called inflation, which would be more cheaply secured by my amendment. It will not be denied that changes in the prices of merchandise, land, and labor, whether effected by means of taxation or by means of the currency, do not occur at the same moment of time to these three classes of things. For example, treble the currency to-day and in a month's time you will find the price of merchandise trebled, but it will be six months' time before the price of land trebles, and it will be a year's time before the price of labor trebles. Eventually all these things would become alike trebled in price, but they will not treble in price at the same time. Now, the effect of this is, that while in a month's time the merchant's stock of goods will have trebled in price, he will, for the currency for which he sells his goods, be still obtaining your labor at the old rate; and while by the end of six months the price of land will have trebled, and consequently the price of house rents, the landlord for three times the amount of currency for which he will now be able to let his house will be still buying the labor of the hard-toiling, deluded workingman—if he wants him to build more houses or to clear more land—at the old rate of wages current before the trebling of the currency.

What is the fate of the workingman, looking at it from his point of view? Why, that for a year after the trebling change in the currency, while he continues to obtain for his labor no more than he did before the change, he must pay, after the first month, treble for all that he eats, drinks, and wears; and, after the sixth month, treble the rent for every room he occupies.

Hence, by my amendment, you will have, minus the expense of new issues, little or no delay, such as the old and slow processes of inflation require, and the same left-handed benefits to all parties, and especially to the laboring man, which such legislation helps least of all.

* In traveling through the West lately my attention was called to the condition of the farming interests, which are much depressed; and I find with some surprise that their great agricultural products, beef, pork, lard, corn, and wheat, in the aggregate, brought quite as much in gold in January, 1861, as the same products brought in paper promises in January, 1873, while all the articles which the farmer consumes were very much higher in 1873. During the first six months of 1860 the average price of mess pork was $17.69 per barrel in gold, and during the first three months of 1861, before the war, it averaged $17.16, gold, while the average for the same period in 1873 was but $13.60, inflated paper. Lard followed pork, and corn was higher during the gold period of 1861 than during the same period in 1873 with only paper afloat. Comment is superfluous. Add another hundred millions of irredeemable paper, and in three years the farmer will be no better paid than a serf. Increasing the legal tender without provision for redemption is sure to bring disaster upon the country and certain destruction to the party which forces such measure. We are brought face to face with this question, and it requires no prophetic vision to foresee that financial chaos will come before another presidential election if we persist in expanding an irredeemable currency.—Judge Pierrepont's letter to Senator Sherman.

CIRCULATION NOT IN SAME RATIO AS WEALTH AND POPULATION.

Mr. Speaker, I confess that I read with interest the admirable remarks of my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. MITCHELL.] He has exemplified by his remarks that canny and careful sense by which he has honestly acquired and justly administered large means. His interest, like that of mine, is not that of speculation. When he says that circulation should not increase in the same ratio with wealth or population, he lays down a proposition which heretofore I endeavored to elaborate. We have now $7.12 more per capita circulation than we had in 1860, and $7.92 more than in 1850. The circulation in England has decreased since 1819 by fifty millions; it is now only $6.50 per head. England's money for circulation is about one-half of ours. Her total money medium is $400,000,000. In 1873 her import and export trade was $3,210,000,000. If she could thus flourish on this small amount of currency, why cannot we? Why, then, does England act as the great exchange mart of the world, the busy broker of all races? Because there is progress in the arts of using money. Drafts, checks, bills of lading, warehouse receipts, due-bills, deposits, clearing-houses, postal and telegraph facilities, and other civilizing elements have come to be in use. They are substitutes for money, they are instruments of commerce, as much so as bank-notes. They are memoranda of credits, and serve as much as Treasury notes for transactions. Deposits even form a part of our currency. If that is doubted, I refer to Carey's Social Science, volume 2, page 386, and Amasa Walker's Science of Wealth, page 148, and to other authorities referred to in my notes. When these credits have become redundant, as in the money crises in this country, panic follows. Therefore it is not in the money issues alone that exchanges are made or values measured. But for these purposes, as well as for currency itself, there must be a fixed standard that is not exceptional or provincial. If the paper dollar ought to be worth so many grains of pure gold, which is the legal and commercial standard, something must be done; and that something is to raise the value of that paper dollar by making the quantity less, and thus secure the quality we require.

PLANS.

Again and again have I urged resumption by some gradual method. I have had votes in committee, and have always been alone in my little affirmative. If it is said that I must present a plan, I ask is it for the minority to do this? No. If the majority cannot do it, let them abdicate; give way to a new party, or to a new order. What has this Administration done? O, yes; I had forgotten. They began a plan on silver dimes and quarters! How much was redeemed? A few sacks of quarters paid out, to debtors of the Government over a certain amount. A few hundred dollars out of the hundred millions to be redeemed. How long before redemption would be complete at this rate? The centennial 2076! Yet, when the panic occurred last fall, the whole country looked to the President for a policy, and that functionary, after due consideration, said that he wondered why the silver had not already made its appearance in circulation. I would like to ask whether there has any change come over the executive mind since on this point, and whether Congress in voting down my resolution for specie, couched in his language, did not do him and his great Secretary injustice?

THE ENGLISH PLAN.

Is there no way of resuming except by resumption? I think not. Certainly the House is not on the way now. We used to say of slavery that the wise policy was to place it "in the hope of its ultimate extinction." Even that is not done on this subject here. England, after her Napoleonic wars, sought specie by a plan we might copy with profit. It involved—

1. That a resumption of specie payments must be surely determined;

2. That the time of resumption must be fixed at a day not unreasonably distant; and

3. That the approach to it should be by regular steps upon which all business interests could calculate.

She accomplished it by providing that at the end of five years from the date of the act coin payments should be fully resumed; that in the mean time a scale of rates should be established at which the currency should be redeemed in uncoined bullion, at prices by weight which should distribute the currency values as nearly as possible evenly over the intervening time.

In so far as the bill of the committee would redeem the legal-tenders in coin, it is entitled to respect, even though the redemption is prospective and remote; but in so far as it would supplant the greenbacks with bank-notes—irredeemable—it is faulty and needs safeguards and provisions against the excesses of free banking. England moved otherwise to the goal of resumption. What was the result? Confidence was restored. Trade began to know its rules and to regulate itself to statutory certainties, and paper reached par in advance of the time fixed by a year. No, sir; your bills now may give a temporary lull to the perturbations of trade; but your tinkering makeshifts are not a permanent settlement. There is no way to resumption, except through honest faith in your promises.

DISASTERS OF BROKEN FAITH.

Seeing, then, that these unredeemed and irredeemable notes are out; that they are the disturbing elements in our material advancement; that the "necessity" which pressed their issue has gone by; that their substitution for lawful money has unavoidably tended to inflate prices, beget speculation, foster extravagance, enrich the few, impoverish the many, discourage labor, derange trade, intimidate enterprise, and damage public credit at home and abroad, thereby producing innumerable evils in the management of private business and public affairs; and seeing further that the faith of the United States was solemnly pledged, on the 18th day of March, 1869, to pay said notes "in coin or its equivalent," and "to make provision for the redemption thereof in coin at the earliest practicable period;" we are bound as honest legislators to prevent a perpetuity of mischief, to keep faith with all, by retracing our steps and resuming our onward march to prosperity through fair-dealing.

There is no compromise in this matter. You cannot reach specie, except you bring the currency down to a smaller sum. Your fiscal Halifaxes may howl for gradual contraction or a little inflation, or the safe mean between; but this situation, even if through sacrifice, is to be reached by grasping the principles which experience has determined with logical precision.

Have we no political ethics? Is there no commercial and public honor left? Will the opinion of the world register our recent votes here to deny our just promises to pay, to praise or condemn? Is credit nothing?

A STAINLESS NAME.

There is only one way, Mr. Speaker, to retrieve the public credit, to promote the national name, to restore to all properties their legitimate value, to furnish new and safe resources both to trade, agriculture, and commerce, and to keep sacred the provisions of our obligations; and that is to return to the constitutional coin, as the basis and standard of all wages and values. Public debts are not blessings, nor are panics, as the President said they were, blessings in disguise. They invite to prodigality, they destroy the public morality, they take away from the State its immortal part, its conscience; they lay the foundations whereon improvidence, selfishness, and scoundrelism build to the general hurt. More precious than gold or rubies is the stainless name of a nation. Since our civil war and its demoralizing tendencies, we have enough to cure and avoid. The duration of our institutions depends on the observance of obligations, as well as upon the avoidance of sectional asperities and official prostitution. In such times the metallic currency, by reason of its intrinsic value, becomes of moral value; excessive issues require more than ever salutary checks, and it is the first duty of the State to guard against the mercenary elements which sap the foundations of social honesty and order.

PAPER WINGS.

Gentlemen are familiar with Pope's Essay on Man. Read the opening of his third epistle. Why did Heaven hide the "shining mischief underground?" He does not give the answer in full, nor the answer of the economist. It was not hidden, merely because the sunny metal entered into fraud as well as into luxury; not because it enlarges the sphere of lust and hires the assassin, lures the pirate and corrupts the friend, bribes a senate and betrays a land; not that the captive Cleopatra should wear it in chains, or for it that Judas should sell his Master; not because it plays its part in Ashantee subsidies or in Wall street gambling-bourses; not because, as my eloquent friend from New Jersey so well said, "Abraham counted shekels in the first recorded bargain; or William extracted from France a coin-subsidy; or the Pacific islander clamors for gold; or the poet laureate of England sells his muse;" not because it is the token for those values which give luxury its cup and society its surfeit. Heaven hid it in the earth to be delved after, to make it precious, steadily precious, to be stamped and milled, as a measure and standard, to help the interchanges of men in their interdependence on one another. No wonder the same satirist, drawing from contemporaneous policies, and seeing the future as if it were before him in Merlin's magic mirror, gave his sarcastic benediction to the inflationists of his and our time:

> Blest paper credit! Last and best supply
> To lend corruption lighter wings to fly!

For one, I will by no vote add to the scandalous prodigality of the times. By no vote will I add another feather to the wing of paper credit. Rather let us strip the plumage from these airy presumptions, and fix our future on the solid foundations of public credit and the obligations of commercial honor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 204) for the relief of Robert Bent and Jack Smith.

It further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 154) for the relief of William Stoddard, late assistant quartermaster of United States volunteers;

An act (H. R. No. 1405) for the relief of Victor Mylius, of Macoupin County, Illinois;

An act (H. R. No. 1585) for the relief of the heirs of Seth Lamb;

An act (H. R. No. 1932) for the relief of Frank M. Kelley;

An act (H. R. No. 1922) to establish a reservation for certain Indians in the Territory of Montana;

An act (H. R. No. 1222) for the relief of George W. Keyes; and

An act (H. R. No. 517) for the relief of Sarah F. Lincoln, postmaster at Spencerport, Monroe County, New York.

It further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 170) for the relief of certain officers of the Navy who were dropped, furloughed, or retired under the act of February 28, 1855;

An act (S. N. 403) to allow the schooner Ocean Wave to take the name of Edith E. Wright, and be registered under that name;

An act (S. No. 377) to change the name of the port of San Pedro, California, to Wilmington;

An act (S. No. 508) for the relief of Andrew Johnson, of Logansport, Indiana; and

An act (S. No. 617) to fix the amount of the United States notes and the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes.

CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes.

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, the financial question is at this time engrossing the attention of our people to a greater extent than ever before known in our history. It is the topic of discussion not only in the counting-rooms of the merchant and the parlors of the banker, but also in the workshops of the artisan and the home of the farmer; it will be debated in these Halls, and in the school-houses of the country as well, until a result will have been reached which shall prove acceptable to the public mind; and such a result will be the permanent establishment of a financial system commensurate with the wants of our people, and adapted to and in harmony with the circumstances surrounding them, irrespective of any systems or theories having their origin in other lands, and applicable to conditions of commercial affairs differing widely in many respects from ours.

The American mind is not theoretical; on the contrary, it is eminently practical, and it will not be wedded to theories, however plausible or attractive, which it finds on examination to be incompatible with the development, the growth, and progress of the varied material interests of our country.

It may be taken for granted that our people, however they may differ in detail or the mode of accomplishing the result, substantially agree that we need a currency of uniform legal value, resting upon a basis of unquestioned security, and of a volume sufficient to meet all the requirements of the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests of the country; to which I might add the additional quality of adaptability to those interests, as at different times a greater or lesser amount is required by the exigencies of business.

The best methods for creating such a currency, of regulating its security and volume, and imparting to it a proper flexibility, are questions upon which the public is now divided, but for which the discussions to which I have referred will sooner or later provide a solution. What, then, constitutes a currency of uniform legal value? It is that which possesses among our people the same purchasing power in all parts of our country. Our dollar is a conventional unit of value, whether that dollar is composed of gold or silver metal, or a paper dollar issued, or authorized to be issued, by the legislative power of the country.

The term "money" is variously defined. I hold that to be "money" which the law declares to be money, without reference to the material of which it is composed. Money or currency, therefore, issued by and under the authority of the United States, will possess a uniform legal value among our people so long as the people have confidence in the faith and stability of the national Government; and this position is abundantly verified by our history.

We are constantly told by the contractionists that, to have a currency of uniform legal value, it must consist of gold and silver exclusively, or be based upon gold and silver. The former is totally impracticable, because the precious metals do not exist in sufficient quantities to be used for such a purpose, and hence do not, in reference to values, possess a representative capacity, unless you shrink, or dwarf, or contract your commercial values to a point that would produce universal and permanent stagnation in all the industries of the country. The amount of gold and silver coin now in our country is estimated at less than $200,000,000, and hence, with an exclusive metal currency, all the vast commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests of the country must accommodate themselves to that comparatively insignificant sum. The idea is preposterous, and will not for a moment be entertained by a rational people. The assumption that gold and silver possess a special value as a basis for a paper currency is equally fallacious and untenable. A base, to have any value or to give proper support to its superstructure, must be as broad as the superstructure itself. This is an axiom in architecture, and when we use the same term to denote the purposes of a specie basis for a paper currency we must use the term in its architectural sense. How then can you erect a superstructure represented by the figures 6 or 8 upon a base represented by the figures 3 or 4? Your base is altogether too narrow, too contracted, to sustain the superstructure, and the result is that the first gales of a financial storm will tumble your fabric to the ground. It does very well so long as you have calm weather, a spirit of generous confidence, no disturbance in the financial world, because your paper currency, resting upon an insufficient specie basis, leans for a very large portion of its support upon public confidence. When such confidence becomes impaired or is withdrawn, your paper currency fails to respond to the requirements of the public, and, going down step by step, soon reaches the point where it is utterly worthless. And this result will follow, as is abundantly shown in all our past financial history, whether one dollar in gold is the base of five dollars in paper or whether the five dollars in paper are based on two or three dollars of gold.

I speak of paper currency having nothing to recommend it to the public beyond the insufficient basis of coin upon which in ordinary banking systems it usually rests, and which in the nature of things must always be insufficient so long as you have not as many gold dollars as you have paper dollars resting on them; for the difference in numbers between the gold dollars and the paper dollars in such a system must be made up by generous confidence or the individual liability of stockholders, neither of which is of much avail when the holders of such paper desire its payment in coin.

My second proposition is closely allied to the first—indeed the two might with propriety be said to be coexistent; for if a currency rests upon a base of unquestioned security, a security which is accepted by the entire community, and which challenges such acceptance by its universally acknowledged sufficiency, it will inevitably follow that such currency will be of uniform value throughout the country.

In what manner, then, can you provide a currency having such unquestioned security? I have already shown that it cannot exist exclusively of gold and silver; for if there were no other objection to an exclusively metallic currency, the fact that we do not possess it in such quantity as to meet the demands of business generally, or even one-fourth part of such demands, would be an insuperable objection against it.

No banking system, State or national, which this country had prior to the late war ever possessed either of the requisites which I hold are essential to a good and acceptable currency, for no such banking system ever furnished to our people a currency of uniform value based on unquestioned security. Even the best of our State-bank currency lost its par value as it wandered beyond the shadow of the banking house whence it was issued, and the holder of the currency, before he could use it in the ordinary channels of trade and commerce, had to submit to a reduction from its face value in the shape of exchange, frequently to such an extent as to seriously impair the profits of his business.

I have stated that prior to the late war we never had any system of banking, State or national, which furnished a currency possessing either of the requisites of uniform value or unquestioned security, and if our present system of bank currency possesses either or both of these requisites, it is because it is based upon the bonds of the Government, and all the property and resources of the United States have been most freely pledged for the payment of these bonds.

The national-bank currency derives but little, if any, of its value from its purely bankable character; nor does it obtain the confidence of the people on account of any supposition of being based upon coin in their vaults, for it is not based upon coin, nor do the banks have a dollar in their vaults with which to redeem their circulation. Nor does the individual liability of stockholders give to that currency any perceptible value, for such liability is of no immediate avail in times of financial distrust and disaster. It is safe to say that but for the fact that the United States stands as the indorser for the ultimate payment of every dollar of national-bank currency, it would not rank in value with the best of our bank currency prior to the war. How, then, can we obtain a currency for the people which shall possess this basis of undoubted security? My answer is, to utilize our national indebtedness, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in that direction, and to that extent make our national debt a national blessing. By doing so you have as a pledge for every dollar of your currency the energy, the industry, the resources, and more than all these, the united patriotism of forty millions of people. You will thus have a currency created by the people, for the people, and in which the people will have undoubted and unlimited confidence, because it is theirs, and because they love the Government which will protect it as it protects them.

We come next to inquire as to the volume or amount of currency required by the business interests of this vast Republic. Who will arrogate to himself the ability to answer this question? Who can say that just so many dollars are required, and that the amount thus arbitrarily assumed shall not be increased, notwithstanding the continual increase in our population, the opening up of new settlements, and the development of new industries? Just as the growing man requires more food and raiment than the youth, so does our nation in its developing progress require daily and yearly more currency to meet the constantly increasing demands of business.

Immediately upon the close of the war the amount of all kinds of currency in actual circulation, or serving indirectly that purpose, was but little less than $2,000,000,000. At the close of the fiscal year, June, 1868, the amount of currency was one-half of the foregoing amount. This was the amount when the country had fairly settled down to a peace basis, and had adjusted its commerce and industries to a peace standard; which amount should not have been changed except to increase with the increasing wants of the people. And yet, taking the years between July 1, 1868, and June 30, 1873, we find from the official reports of the Treasurer an absolute contraction and reduction of currency to an amount not less than $300,000,000. Is it any wonder that the crash of last September came upon us? The only wonder is that it did not come sooner, and with still greater devastation in its train.

And yet in these intervening years the Southern States have in a great measure recovered from the desolating effects of that war, and are entering upon a career of material prosperity greater than they ever enjoyed before. During that time our territories have been rapidly filling up with an industrious and enterprising population; the other portions of the Union changing from a state of war to a state of peace, with industries of all kinds reviving and multiplying. All these causes are creating demands for increased monetary facilities, and yet when we ask in behalf of the great body of the people for a commensurate increase of currency, we are told that we are "expansionists," "inflationists," and that we are asking for that which will be of positive injury instead of positive good.

Cast your eyes over this broad land; see the number of honest laboring men ready and eager to earn their daily bread by daily toil, with willing hearts and willing hands; but, alas! with no demands for their labor. Look at your vast and, until recently, thriving manufacturing interests. The forge-hammers ring out no merry sound; the furnace-fires have ceased to glow. Turn to your commercial and agricultural interests, and they lie prostrate as if stricken by paralysis, no vitality, no energy anywhere; and looking thus over the whole ground, let me ask this House whether the people have not ascertained the true cause which has produced this state of affairs when they assert that currency, which is the life-blood of all our industries, does not exist in sufficient quantities to afford the necessary vitality. I grant you there are exceptions among our people to this general proposition, but in this, as in other cases, exceptions only prove the rule. The man who is fortunate enough to have accumulated his "pile;" who is a money-lender instead of a borrower; who lives upon incomes from his permanently invested capital; whose coupons bring him with unceasing regularity his semi-annual interest in gold; whose bonds and mortgages yield him their annual supply with the regularity of the returning seasons, and that too at high and often exorbitant rates of interest—this class of our fellow-citizens does not feel the oppression which is bearing so heavily upon the active men of business and the toiling millions, whose labor properly employed and properly encouraged would make this land prosperous beyond the prosperity of any other nation.

That class of our fellow-citizens, exceedingly small numerically but exceedingly powerful financially, favors contraction, well knowing that contraction will add a large percentage to their bonds and increase the purchasing power of their dollars.

But, sir, this Government must be administered upon the principle of the "greatest good to the greatest number," and the people will see to it that it is thus administered.

It is frequently urged here and elsewhere that we have now a redundancy of currency; that it should be reduced to a point which will leave no margin in the market value between paper money and gold, but to what point that reduction must be carried to produce the foregoing result is not very clearly demonstrated. A very correct test of the question whether we have a redundancy of currency can be had by comparing the amount of money in circulation per capita in our country with the money in circulation per capita in some of the principal nations of Europe.

The actual circulation in this country at present is about $16.75 to each individual. In England the amount is about $24.25 to each individual. In Germany it is about $26.80, and in France within a fraction of $34.75 to each individual. It thus appears that while the amount in this country is only $16.75 to each individual, the average amount of circulation in the three foreign countries I have named, and which stand in the front rank of civilization, commerce, and manufactures, is $28.60, being $11.85 to each individual more than the amount of circulation in this country.

Let this Congress by its legislation place our people on an equal footing in this respect with the people of these three great nations of Europe, and you will hear no further complaint in reference to a scarcity of currency. And is there any reason why our people cannot use profitably the same amount of money we find circulating in the nations I have named? On the contrary there is every reason why the amount should be greater here than there. We are comparatively a new country, in process of rapid development; our people are spread over the entire continent, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, covering an extent of territory far greater than either England, France, or Germany, and hence lacking that facility of rapid concentration of currency to points where most needed at specified periods which a country of less territorial extent possesses.

I come back, then, to the proposition, how can you determine what precise amount of currency is needed by our people. Can you fix the amount by law? Will a procrustean theory answer? Is there sufficient wisdom among men to fix the amount by legislation? I answer all these questions in the negative. There is only one law which can fix this amount, and that is the great law of supply and demand. This law must not be restricted or shackled by unwise legislation. Leave it free and unfettered to be determined by the wants and operations of our people in all their vast and varied business interests. As well might you regulate by law the amount of wheat or corn or cotton which our people shall annually produce, as to attempt by law to determine the amount of currency required by the people. Leave this matter to their own sound practical judgment and experience, and, my word for it, they will take care of themselves without the intervention of your assumed guardianship over them.

This law of supply and demand will impart to our currency its flexible character, regulating its volume and adopting such volume to the wants, I may with propriety say the changing wants, of traffic; for there are periods of the year, more especially in our agricultural regions, when the movement of our immense surplus productions to a market will require a much larger portion of currency than in those periods of the year when the agriculturist is engaged in the cultivation of those productions.

I shall not stop here to enter into a discussion of the details by which this flexible character of currency shall be inaugurated and regulated, but the interconvertible bond system, so ably urged upon the country by its friends, could very readily be made an agent in this process of increasing or diminishing the volume of currency and adapting it to the actual wants of business without producing on the one hand an overissue or redundancy, and on the other an undue contraction of the currency.

In passing, permit me here to say a word in reference to our present system of national banking. I make no war upon those banks nor have an unkind word to utter against those of our citizens who in good faith accepted the invitation of the Government thus to engage in banking.

This system was the outgrowth of the financial troubles which beset the Government in the midst of the late war. The State banks had suspended, and could afford no relief to the Government or people—a resort to the issue of a Government currency exclusively was an untried experiment—and hence Congress adopted the twofold plan of national-bank currency and Government currency.

To my mind there are very serious objections to the longer continuance of national banks as banks of issue.

Among these we find that the system is a monopoly, granting to a very few of our people privileges which are denied to others. Our Government should under no circumstances grant a right to one citizen which it denies to another. Monopolies are always more or less odious, and will not long be tolerated by a free people. While the burdens of the Government fall equally upon all, its benefits should equally be extended to all our people.

Again, under this system the national banks never can redeem their currency in coin, as I have more fully shown in another portion of these remarks.

Again, the Government pays to these banks a heavy annual interest, amounting to about $20,000,000 on the bonds which they pledge for their currency. This should be avoided, and this large amount of interest saved to the people, or, what would be still better, let the Government issue its own money and exchange it for its bonds, and thus convert to that extent an interest-bearing debt into a non-interest-bearing debt.

Again, there is annually a considerable amount of currency lost and destroyed by the casualties of fire, water, and other agencies, all of which inures now to the benefit of the bankers, while it justly belongs to the people, for the Government is responsible for the redemption of this money, and hence should have the benefit of such loss or destruction. Did time permit I could urge other objections which readily suggest themselves.

It is hardly necessary to argue the proposition whether the States can authorize the issue of currency by banks created by State authority, for the simple reason that no one doubts the power of the Government to levy a tax upon such currency, and the power to tax, as is well known, is the power to destroy. Hence the assumed or granted right of a State to authorize the issue of currency becomes nugatory, from the fact that the Government by its taxing power can at will destroy State action on this subject.

We are told that for the last eight or ten years our people have had a redundancy of currency, and a consequent inflation of prices, and that such a state of things is injurious to their best interests.

I deny the proposition, and confidently appeal to that period of our history when, as is alleged, inflation has been injurious as the most prosperous we have ever witnessed. During that period our people have opened up new fields for settlement and cultivation; have developed our mineral resources, and demonstrated to the world that in all the elements of national wealth we are without a superior. During that period internal improvements have been projected and completed in every portion of the Union. Manufacturing establishments of every description have dotted almost every neighborhood, the farmer has realized remunerative prices for his products, the laboring man has found abundant employment and at prices that have enabled him to procure a home for his family, to feed, clothe, and educate them, and place him and them in a state of comparative independence; hamlets, villages, and cities have sprung up as if by magic, while the wealth which has flowed into your Treasury in consequence of this prosperity has enabled the Government to reduce our national debt since the close of the war, from the 1st of July, 1866, to the 1st of July, 1873, the enormous sum of $540,000,000, of which the sum of $370,000,000 was paid during the first term of the present national administration.

Here you have a picture, imperfectly drawn, but which shows deeds done of which every citizen has reason to be proud, and all this under the so-called inflation of the currency. If this be ruinous, our people are doubtless willing to continue such ruin for at least the next ten years to come.

But while the business of the country was enlarging and expanding in all directions, requiring an increase of currency to meet its demands, your volume of currency was undergoing contraction; and what is the result? The general prostration of business, the unemployed thousands of our mechanics and laboring men, the almost universal stagnation of trade and commerce which has hung like a pall over the land since last September, and which still hangs over it, furnish a more eloquent answer than human lips can utter. And in addition to this baleful effect upon the individual interests of the country, your national debt instead of being reduced has actually been increased; the increase for the month of November alone being not less than $9,000,000. A policy of contraction will never pay our national debt, or lift its heavy burdens from our shoulders.

How is this currency to be provided for the people? My emphatic answer is, by the direct action of the Government.

Among the highest duties of a government toward its people is the duty of providing for them a circulating medium with which to carry on their trade and commerce. This is an attribute of sovereign power, and cannot with propriety be transferred by the Government to any of its citizens whether in an individual or associated capacity; it should be exercised by the Government itself as it exercises other of its attributes, and the currency which is used by the people, whether of coin or paper, should bear upon its face the pledge of national faith and the impress of national authority. This attribute of our Government, and its resulting duty, has so recently received judicial sanction at the hands of our Supreme Court that I cheerfully present a few extracts from the opinion of the late Chief Justice Chase, in the case of the Veazie Bank vs. Fenno, (8 Wallace, 533:)

It cannot be doubted that under the Constitution the power to provide a circulation of coin is given to Congress. And it is settled by the uniform practice of the Government and by repeated decisions that Congress may constitutionally authorize the emission of bills of credit. It is not important here to decide whether the quality of legal tender, in payment of debts, can be constitutionally imparted to these bills; it is enough to say that there can be no question of the power of the Government to emit them; to make them receivable in payment of debts to itself; to fit them for use by those who see fit to use them in all the transactions of commerce; to provide for their redemption; to make them a currency uniform in value and description, and convenient and useful for circulation. These powers, until recently, were only partially and occasionally exercised. Lately, however, they have been called into full activity, and Congress has undertaken to supply a currency for the entire country. * * * * * * *

Having thus in the exercise of undisputed constitutional powers undertaken to provide a currency for the whole country, it cannot be questioned that Congress may, constitutionally, secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation. To this end Congress has denied the quality of legal tender to foreign coins, and has provided by law against the imposition of counterfeit and base coin upon the community. To the same end Congress may restrain by suitable enactments the circulation as money of any notes not issued under its own authority. Without this power, indeed, its attempts to secure a sound and uniform currency for the country must be futile.

Our highest judicial tribunal has here recognized the full power of Congress under the Constitution "to provide a currency for the whole people," and to do this by emitting a paper currency directly by the Government; to make such currency uniform in value and description, and convenient and useful for circulation.

And the same court in a prior case (9 Howard, 560) declared, in consonance with a long line of judicial decisions, that—

Whatever functions Congress are by the Constitution authorized to perform, they are, when the public good requires it, bound to perform.

I am aware that the power of Congress to attach a legal-tender character to such issue is denied or seriously doubted by many of the best legal minds in the country. An equal diversity of opinion was entertained with reference to the exercise by Congress of other powers within the last ten or twelve years, but the exercise of which has been sanctioned by judicial decisions or the general acquiescence of our people.

But conceding the right and duty of Congress to provide a circulating medium for the people, and recognizing the undeniable fact that such circulating medium cannot possibly consist of coin alone, and that a resort to paper for the larger portion of our circulating medium is a positive necessity, it follows beyond cavil that it is the duty of Congress to give to such paper a character that will make it available to the people for the purposes intended; for in this respect "Congress has the power to use all appropriate means for legitimate ends."

In furtherance of this view the opinion of a majority of the Supreme Court in the "Legal-tender cases" may be aptly quoted:

The Constitution was intended to frame a government as distinguished from a league or compact, a government supreme in some particulars over States and people. It was designed to provide the same currency, having a uniform legal value in all the States. It was for this reason the power to coin money and regulate its value was conferred upon the Federal Government, while the same power as well as the power to emit bills of credit was withdrawn from the States. The States can no longer declare what shall be money or regulate its value. Whatever power there is over the currency is vested in Congress. If the power to declare what is money is not in Congress, it is annihilated.

And again, in the same opinion, we find the following:

In view of this it might be argued with much force that when it is considered in what brief and comprehensive terms the Constitution speaks, how sensible its framers must have been that emergencies might arise when the precious metal (then more scarce than now) might prove inadequate to the necessities of the Government and the demands of the people; when it is remembered that paper money was almost exclusively in use in the States as the medium of exchange, and when the great evil sought to be remedied was the want of uniformity in the current value of money, it might be argued, we say, that the gift of power to coin money and regulate the value thereof was understood as conveying general power over the currency, the power which had belonged to the States and which they surrendered.

And this power of Congress to give to its currency a legal-tender character is still more strongly asserted in the following language, taken from the opinion in said cases:

How, then, can the grant of a power to coin money and regulate its value, made in terms so liberal and unrestrained, coupled also with a denial to the States of all power over the currency, be regarded as an implied prohibition to Congress against declaring Treasury notes a legal tender, if such a declaration is appropriate and adapted to carrying into execution the admitted powers of the Government?

Justice Bradley, in his opinion in said cases, adds the following emphatic language:

Another ground of the power to issue Treasury notes or bills is the necessity of providing a proper currency for the country, and especially of providing for the failure or disappearance of the ordinary currency in times of financial pressure and threatened collapse of commercial credit. Currency is a national necessity. The operations of the Government as well as private transactions are wholly dependent upon it. The State governments are prohibited from making money or issuing bills. Uniformity of money was one of the objects of the Constitution. The coinage of money and regulation of its value is conferred upon the General Government exclusively.

That Government has also the power to issue bills. It follows, as a matter of necessity, as a consequence of these various provisions, that it is specifically the duty of the National Government to provide a national currency.

Mr. TREMAIN. Justice Bradley intimated in his opinion that this power could never be exercised by Congress except in case of war or similar necessity.

Mr. ORTH. I grant that Justice Bradley intimates that in his opinion. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] will also recollect that the majority of the court, in delivering their opinion, made no such intimation, but on the contrary claimed it as a right to be exercised by Congress at all times under the Constitution.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. If Justice Bradley had not gone with the majority there would have been no majority on that side.

Mr. ORTH. That may be. It takes only one with God to make a majority.

In confirmation of these views let us glance a moment at some of the express grants of power by the Constitution to Congress and see what necessary implications of power attach to them, and which are so self-evident as to admit of no serious doubt, and in view of which implied powers Congress has frequently acted, and exercised them without challenge.

Under the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States," Congress has erected light-houses on the sea-coast and lake-coast, has built marine hospitals, has enacted that steam-vessels shall have certain requisites to insure the safety of passengers, &c.

Under the power "to establish post-offices and post-roads," Congress has provided for our vast system of transporting the mails, and for punishing the robbing of the mails.

The power to declare war carries with it the right to carry on war, and all the manifold rights and privileges almost innumerable incident to a state of war; and the power to declare war necessarily carries with it the right to make peace, and with peace even to acquire the territory and people of a foreign nation.

These are a few of the reasons which present themselves to my mind in favor of the proposed action of Congress and its power under the Constitution. But let us, for the sake of the argument, waive the question of the right of Congress to give to such currency a legal-tender character, although such right, both in times of war and peace, is clearly maintained by the Supreme Court.

I do not regard it as absolutely essential to the value of such currency or its entire acceptability to our people that it should be a legal tender in payment of debts. If Congress provides that such currency shall be receivable for all national taxes and for all dues to the Government, except duties on imports, it will have ample circulation. And the day is not far distant when, by converting portions of our bonded debt into this currency and thus reducing our interest, we shall be able to receive such currency in part payment of our import duties.

We have now outstanding legal-tenders to the amount of about $380,000,000, of whose legal-tender character there is no doubt, and which amount is amply sufficient to serve the purpose of coin in paying debts between individuals where lawful money is demanded by creditors. But I will not detain the House by further argument to prove what really needs no proof, that if the Government will issue its currency even without attaching to it a legal-tender quality it will be gladly received and used by our people as a circulating medium. It may be asked, how will this currency be brought into circulation among the people should Congress authorize its issue? On this occasion I content myself by simply advocating the great principle, not having the time to discuss the necessary details connected with bringing it into circulation. Details readily adjust themselves after principles shall have been settled and accepted.

No difficulty need, however, be apprehended, for the Government pays out annually in its various operations, exclusive of interest on the public debt, not less than $180,000,000; and this amount is annually increasing with the increasing growth of the country.

In making these payments the Government must use coin or paper currency. It has no coin to use for such purposes, hence must use paper currency, and would of course use the currency which is thus issued directly by the Government.

Another agency for its introduction into the channels of trade would be for Congress to provide for retiring the present national-bank currency, with permission to existing banks, if they desire it, to surrender to the Government the bonds now hypothecated with the Treasurer, and obtain in lieu thereof the notes or currency of the Government thus to be issued.

Would the banks consent to this surrender and exchange? Self-interest is a strong motive-power among all men, and especially so among bankers. Their self-interest would prompt them to accept such an arrangement with alacrity, because it would enable them to obtain currency for the face-value of their bonds, instead of 90 per cent. only, as under the present law.

In the next place, they would be enabled to use all their currency in their business, dispensing with the reserve of 15 or 25 per cent. which they are now compelled by law to retain in their vaults, and not being responsible for the redemption of this currency no portion of their capital would lie dormant; all of their means could be utilized. Again, let Congress authorize a system of free banking, under proper restrictions, of which all persons can avail themselves who will take from the Government a specified amount of such currency in exchange for the bonds of the Government; and, thirdly, authorize the bonds of the Government to be converted into currency at the will of any holder of such bond or bonds, and, at the like will of the holder of such currency, its reconvertibility into Government bonds bearing a low rate of interest.

An objection urged against this Government currency is, that you will have more than is needed for the legitimate purposes of the business. I have already, in part, anticipated this objection by showing that the law of supply and demand will regulate and control, as it regulates and controls every other pursuit or vocation. Does any person pretend that we should regulate the number of bushels of wheat or corn that shall be produced, or the number of pounds of cotton, or beef, or of pork? Does any one pretend that the number of merchants or manufacturers, or that the quantum of their business, should be restricted and limited by law? Clearly not. All these matters are left, and wisely left, to free competition, which is but another phrase for supply and demand. Then why should the amount of currency be thus arbitrarily limited and restricted? No man engages or continues in the business of farming, of merchandising, or of manufacturing unless he finds that the business is remunerative. Why not apply the same principle to this question of currency? No man will exchange his Government bonds for Government currency unless he finds it to be his interest to do so; and he will certainly not exchange his bonds for a greater amount of currency than he can use to advantage.

I cannot appreciate the position which, while it permits trade, commerce, business of whatever nature to be perfectly free and untrammeled, places shackles upon currency which is the very life-blood of such business.

This brings me to another objection which is urged with much persistency to this currency, and that is its irredeemable character; and here let me add, if only by way of parenthesis, that our people have not had a dollar of redeemable currency since the year 1862. Twelve years of irredeemable currency and yet not a word of complaint from our people as to the character of their money for that long period of time! Is there another instance on record of such patience and moderation?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I would ask the gentleman whether the resolutions of the republican national convention, and the resolutions of the democratic national convention, calling a return to specie payments are not in the nature of a complaint of the insufficiency of paper money?

Mr. ORTH. I am not discussing party platforms.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The gentleman said there was no complaint.

Mr. ORTH. And that is a complaint, if at all, not of the people, but of the politicians who make the platforms generally.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I refer the gentleman also to the legislation of Congress and the repeated pledges to return to the specie standard.

Mr. ORTH. Twelve years without gold and silver as a circulating medium, and yet universal satisfaction and universal prosperity, until the vast business interests outgrew the limited and restricted amount of currency, and the crash came—a crash that would not have occurred under a system of finance such as I have indicated in these remarks. The law of supply and demand would have come to the rescue of our people; for it is generally conceded that a timely increase of so small an amount even as fifty millions of currency would have saved the country from the calamity which overtook it, and would have saved the farmers of the West and South from the heavy sacrifices they could not avoid in the sale of their products because of the insufficiency of currency.

We have had twelve years of an "irredeemable currency." This may seem a long time, but in my judgment more than twelve years will yet intervene, under our present imperfect financial system, before we have a redeemable currency.

Suppose you pass a law requiring specie payments to take place at any time in the near future, with our foreign trade showing annual balances against us, and your law will be a dead-letter upon the statute-book, both as regards the Government greenbacks and the national-bank notes. The Government cannot redeem. The Secretary of the Treasury tried that recently; fortunately for the Treasury he tried it on a very small basis and continued it for a very short period of time.

But small as were the operations and short as was the time, it demonstrated the futility of the enterprise. The national banks cannot redeem, and would not make the attempt even if required to do so. In fact I doubt very much whether it was ever contemplated that the national banks should pay specie for their notes. If such ever was the intention, time has clearly demonstrated their inability to do so. If such a law were passed and its execution persisted in, the result would be to wind up every national bank in the country and throw upon the Government the duty of redeeming their paper, a duty which the Government could perform only so long as such a financial crisis would not bring the Government bonds to less than 10 per cent. below par. Whenever the bonds dropped below that figure, as they assuredly would, the Government would find itself as helpless as the banks, and then we should have an irredeemable currency, with this added disadvantage, that faith in the financial ability of the Government would also be impaired. Why this clamor for specie payment in certain sections of the Union and among a certain class of our people?

In this commercial age gold possesses but little if any value as a currency in the ordinary transactions of life. As a standard for the settlement of balances of trade between the different nations of the earth it alone possesses any real value, because those balances can only be adjusted by what the world recognizes as the standard of financial value. The debtor nation on the day of settlement must provide this standard for the liquidation of its balances; and hence, to avoid the ruinous effect of such adjustment of balances, it is the part of prudence in every nation so to conduct its commercial affairs as to avoid the balance of trade being against it. In other words, that nation acts most wisely which purchases of another such an amount of commodities only as it can pay for by an exchange of its own productions.

The nation which constantly, or for a long series of years, buys more than it sells, will be crippled, harassed, and eventually bankrupted. I see no other road to specie payments, or rather assimilation in value between gold and paper money, than for our people to buy from foreign nations only to the extent that such foreign nations receive in payment our own products. When this is done, then resumption becomes an accomplished fact; for when there is no foreign demand for our gold, it will possess no greater value as a circulating medium among our people than a paper currency in which they have confidence; and need I add, in the light of our experience for the last twelve years, that a paper currency based upon the faith and credit of this great Republic possesses to the utmost extent the confidence of our people, and to a greater extent than any other system of paper currency which has yet been devised.

Let us so shape our policy, both by legislation and the concurrent action of our people, as to avoid foreign indebtedness; go to our own workshops in preference to the workshops of Europe; patronize our own laboring men in preference to the laboring men of the Old World; furnish to our people a currency of uniform value, of undoubted security, and of sufficient volume to meet their demands, and we shall be wiser, happier, and more prosperous, both in our individual and national capacity.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] will allow me before he sits down, I wish to direct his attention to a question in regard to the loss of national-bank notes. As I understand the law it is this: that a national bank returning its own notes to the Treasury for cancellation, or an equal number of legal-tender notes, can take up its bonds, but not otherwise. The practical effect, the gentleman must see as the law now stands, is this: that whatever bank-notes are lost, the law must inure to the benefit of the Treasury.

Mr. ORTH. I thank the gentleman from Tennessee for calling my attention to this point. In reply I would say that he is aware the percentage of loss is very considerable. Bankers put it, I believe, at about 1 per cent. per annum. But whether the percentage is greater or less, I grant that as the law now stands the banks cannot receive their bonds so long as there is any portion of their currency outstanding, but only the interest on such bonds. But if at the end of fifteen, ten, or five years, after the termination of the present national-bank system, you will find still such an amount of bank-notes unpresented it will eventually be a question for Congress to say whether the bank shall have the benefit of that loss or not. And I think every fair-minded man will give the answer that, having taken the risks and chances of loss in banking, the banks are entitled to their legitimate profits, and this is one of the legitimate profits of the banks. At all events, without any action on the part of Congress, the banks will continue to draw interest on the bonds which are hypothecated for the unredeemed or lost notes, and hence practically the banks receive the benefit of such loss.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman and I should live that long, which is hardly probable, or if we should both happen to be then in this House, which is far less probable, I infer from what he has said that when that question comes up he and I will be found on different sides of the record. My opinion is that the Government, and not the banks, ought to have the benefit accruing from this loss of bank-notes.

Mr. ORTH. I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee this question: Would the Government, so long as the notes are unredeemed and unpresented at the Treasury, if the banks have gone out of existence, refuse to pay the interest on the bonds; and at what period of time in the far distant future could the Government undertake to stop the interest on the banks' bonds?

Mr. MAYNARD. When the Government closes the bank system, that question will of course be disposed of on equitable principles according as the facts may then be.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. The bank owns the bond after it is wound up. Can the Government confiscate that bond?

Mr. MAYNARD. The Government will pay it when it is due, I suppose.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. To whom?

Mr. MAYNARD. To the holder.

Mr. COBURN obtained the floor, and yielded five minutes to Mr. PACKARD.

Mr. PACKARD. I desire to speak but a very few minutes. I have not taken the floor for the purpose of delivering a speech on the pending bill. I do not wish to swell the huge volume of financial literature which has been written and spoken and printed and scattered to the four quarters of the nation during the last two months; a mass of "green and gold" literature which, if bound together in one book and opened, with its back resting on the center of the continent—Saint Louis or Du Luth—would extend over the entire land and lave its shining leaves in the waters of both oceans. If I should make my contribution to that volume it would be utterly lost to the world; for who among mortals would ever turn the pages of the ponderous book?

Some months ago, before this debate began, I did intend to make a speech, in defiance of the warning "O that mine enemy would write a book!" But I had no plan. I confess it, sir; I had no financial plan. But there was an advantage in this; I could bring to the study of the subject a mind free from prejudice. I began to read; and I read until I appreciated as never before the words of the wise man, "Of the making of many books there is no end." Then I studied the country. I went over it step by step and foot by foot. I looked into all the banking-houses, the counting-rooms, the grain-elevators, the stock-yards, the sheep-folds, the barns and separators of the whole country. I visited and interviewed the broker of Wall street, the husbandman hauling his grain to the railroad depot, and all the middlemen of every sort that come between the two; and I collected a mass of material for a speech which would alarm the House if I had not already said that I was not going to make one. These materials would be in my hands like clay in the hands of the potter. But I do not know that the country will miss my speech much in the ages that are to come; I do not know that the country will lose much if I do not mold and fashion this wealth of materials into the usual form of twenty-seven columns in the RECORD; but I do know that it would lose a great deal during the hour and ten minutes; for I should of course ask to have my time extended, which I should occupy in preventing by so much a speedy settlement of this question to the relief of the depressed business interests of the country. And for that reason I refrain from making the speech. But I want to say very earnestly and very seriously, and I say it reluctantly, for I love all beautiful things, and true eloquence is my especial delight; hence I should rejoice to listen to my fellow-members; but it seems to me now that the eloquence of silence, varied by the roll-call, would be the sweetest music in the country's ears. It seems to me that we should best serve the country and our constituents if we should say at once what we intend to do, so that the depressed business interests of the country may be relieved, and have a firm foundation on which to rest and feel secure.

I only want to add now, in conclusion, that my researches have not been in vain. I have found food for reflection, thought-germs which have developed into principles, which I shall endeavor to embody in my votes, that they may be felt rather than heard.

Briefly, I name a few of the points, which like finger-boards will guide my action:

First. Inflation is dangerous, and so is contraction. Just enough currency to make the hinges of business turn smoothly is the amount the country needs.

Secondly. The country, especially the West and South, has now less than the necessary amount of currency; and there is contraction seriously crippling business interests. A moderate increase to the level of business wants is not inflation; beyond that would be.

Thirdly. No man, or class of men, ever was or ever will be wise enough to determine just how much currency the country needs.

Fourthly. The amount of currency necessary varies with the times and seasons; hence its volume should have the quality of elasticity.

Fifthly. It would be wise to set our faces goldward, and move on our way carefully and circumspectly; not running or hastening, lest we stumble and fall.

Sixthly. We ought to embody these principles in law as speedily as possible. I am ready to vote at once for any measure that will come nearest to doing this.

That is all I desire to say.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. Speaker, several weeks have been occupied during this session in the discussion of the various financial theories; some favoring expansion and others contraction. The whole of this discussion has arisen out of the financial panic of last fall.

All that I shall attempt on this occasion will be to give some of the causes of the depressed condition of the South, Southwest, and West. And in doing this I hope I shall indulge in no spirit of acrimony. Nor is it my wish that anything I shall say shall in the least stir up any sectional feeling—far be it from me. We have had enough of that, and my whole course in life has been to allay any such feeling. But the South, Southwest, and West are beginning to be very restive under our present system of legislation, and they now appeal to you to stop before it is too late; before the people become too much aroused to allow their reason and better judgment to control. I fear that this session is to pass away without anything being done for their relief.
